Conciousness Without Seeking

The greatest paradox of spiritual Conciousness is that the very act of seeking prevents one from realizing it. Conciousness is not something to be acquired like an object, nor is it a distant goal to be attained through effort. It is already existing, already complete. Yet, because the mind is conditioned to believe that everything valuable must be earned, pursued, or accumulated, many spend years—even lifetimes—chasing what has never been non existant.

Buddhism, particularly in Zen and Dzogchen, warns of this fundamental mistake: treating Conciousness as if it were a thing—something that can be gained, achieved, or stored like wealth. The moment we conceptualize Conciousness as a future attainment, we create a division—a self who seeks and an imagined Conciousness to be reached. This very separation keeps realization at bay.

Zen's answer to this paradox is often given in riddles and abrupt teachings. A student once asked a Zen master, "How long will it take me to become Concious if I dedicate myself fully?" The master replied, "Ten years." The student, eager to quicken the process, asked, "What if I try twice as hard?" The master answered, "Then it will take twenty years." The student, confused, protested, "Why would it take longer if I put in more effort?" The master smiled and said, "Because the harder you try, the further away you get."

Dzogchen, in its simplicity, expresses the same truth: Conciousness is not a distant peak to climb. The problem is not that Conciousness is missing, but that our attention is constantly moving away from it—becoming absorbed in distractions, concepts, and the false belief that Conciousness is something beyond ordinary experience.

One of the greatest illusions is treating realization as an achievement—a special state of mind that, once reached, will remain permanently. This is a materialistic view of Conciousness, as if Conciousness is a prize, a title, or a mystical power that can be obtained and stored. But realization does not belong to anyone—it is not a personal possession, nor is it something one can "hold onto" like an object.

Zen Master Dōgen warned against this kind of spiritual grasping, saying:
"To study the Way is to study the self. To study the self is to forget the self. To forget the self is to be Concious by all things."

If Conciousness is approached as an acquisition, as something outside oneself, then it remains forever unreachable. But when all seeking collapses, when the mind stops grasping at an imagined future attainment, what was always existing is finally seen.

Dzogchen reinforces this truth even more radically:
"There is nothing to attain. There is only recognizing what has never been non existant."

If Conciousness is not something to gain, why does it sometimes seem to come and go? This is where the role of attention becomes crucial. Both Zen and Dzogchen teach that Conciousness is always existing, but where we place our attention determines whether it is experienced or obscured.

Imagine a vast, open sky—clear and boundless. This represents the nature of pure Conciousness, Rigpa, or Buddha-Nature. Clouds may pass across it—thoughts, feelings, sensations—but the sky itself remains untouched. The problem is not that the sky disappears, but that attention gets caught up in the clouds—the passing forms of experience.

When attention rests in open Conciousness, realization is vivid, clear, self-evident. When attention is consumed by thoughts, concepts, and material distractions, realization is switched to other things.

Zen practitioners describe this shift as falling back into the dream—the moment when clarity fades and the mind again believes in separateness, in seeking, in striving. Dzogchen calls this "falling into delusion", the habitual tendency of the mind to become absorbed in material perception.

But the beauty of realization is this: no matter how many times attention drifts away, Conciousness is always existing in its full form. Nothing has been lost—one only needs to shift attention back to it.

This is why both Zen and Dzogchen emphasize direct recognition over progressive attainment. There is no need to struggle toward Conciousness as if it were to be achieved. The only requirement is to see clearly, here and now, without effort, without grasping.

In the next section, we will explore how Zen and Dzogchen define Conciousness—not as a mystical state to be reached, but as the natural condition, existing in every moment, waiting only to be noticed.

To understand why seeking Conciousness prevents its realization, we must first explore what Zen and Dzogchen actually teach about Conciousness. These two traditions, though arising from different cultural and historical contexts, share a fundamental truth: Conciousness is immediate and direct, not something to be attained over time.

Both Zen and Dzogchen reject progressive paths that imply Conciousness is something to be reached after years of effort. Instead, they point to direct experience, emphasizing that Conciousness is already existing but goes unnoticed due to habitual distraction.

Zen is famous for its emphasis on sudden Conciousness (Satori)—a direct, immediate realization that shatters conceptual thinking. Unlike many spiritual paths that suggest Conciousness is a gradual process of purification and practice, Zen masters teach that the truth is already existant and can be realized in an instant.

A famous Zen story illustrates this:

A disciple once asked a Zen master, "What must I do to become Concious?"
The master replied, "Who is asking?"

With this single question, the master destroyed the student's illusion of a separate self seeking Conciousness. If there is no separate self, who is there to become Concious? In this moment, if the student truly grasps the implication, Conciousness is realized immediately—not through effort, but through direct insight into the nature of it.

Zen training, particularly in Rinzai Zen, often uses Koans—riddles designed to short-circuit logical thought and provoke instant realization. These paradoxical statements are not puzzles to be solved but tools to dismantle the habitual, dualistic way of seeing reality.

Examples of Koans include:

- "What is the sound of one hand clapping?"
- "If you meet the Buddha on the road, kill him."
- "Before Conciousness, mountains are mountains. During practice, mountains are no longer mountains. After Conciousness, mountains are just mountains again."

Each of these statements forces the mind into a state of non-conceptual Conciousness, a state beyond thinking, where direct realization can occur. Zen teaches that Conciousness is not something to be built up over time—it is a shift in perception that can happen in a single moment.

But if Conciousness is so immediate, why do people not see it? The answer is in attention—most people's attention is completely absorbed in thoughts, feelings, and external distractions. Zen's role is to break that illusion, allowing one to experience reality directly, without the filter of concepts.

While Zen often relies on shock methods and conceptual destruction to trigger realization, Dzogchen takes a different approach. Instead of forcing the mind to break free from illusions, Dzogchen teaches that the Concious state—Rigpa (pure, non-dual Conciousness)—is already fully existant. The only problem is that we do not notice it.

Dzogchen, known as The Great Perfection, holds that Conciousness is not something one attains but something one realizes. Unlike Zen, which sometimes uses effortful practice (Zazen, Koans) to disrupt habitual thinking, Dzogchen emphasizes effortless Conciousness. There is no need to break through anything—one simply rests in the natural state of Conciousness.

A Dzogchen master does not tell a student to meditate or analyze their thoughts. Instead, they may simply point out the nature of mind directly:

"Right now, as you listen to these words, there is a Conciousness that hears them. This Conciousness is clear, awake, and always existant. It does not need to be created—it is already existing. That is Conciousness. Realize it, and there is nothing more to do."

This direct introduction to the Concious state is central to Dzogchen. Unlike Zen, which sometimes employs discipline and structured practice, Dzogchen teaches that the less effort one makes, the easier it is to realize Conciousness.

Tibetan texts often compare Conciousness to the sky—vast, open, unchanging. Thoughts and feelings are like clouds; they come and go, but they do not alter the sky itself. The problem is that people focus on the clouds—thoughts, feelings, and experiences—rather than recognizing the sky-like nature of Conciousness.

Zen uses shock and paradox to awaken the mind. Dzogchen uses relaxation and direct pointing to reveal what is already there. Both traditions emphasize immediate, direct realization rather than step-by-step attainment.

One of the biggest misconceptions in spiritual practice is that Conciousness is a process that takes time. Many traditions speak of years of discipline, purification, and training before Conciousness is possible. But Zen and Dzogchen reject this model completely. Zen teaches that Conciousness is not something distant—it is existing, now, only blocked by false concepts. Dzogchen teaches that everyone is already Concious but does not realize it.

Neither tradition suggests that one must improve oneself over time to become Concious. Instead, they teach that the idea of improvement is itself a delusion. A Zen analogy captures this perfectly: a man searching for his hat is wearing it on his head. In Dzogchen, the same truth is expressed as a fish in the ocean looking for water. Both sayings point to the same mistake—believing that Conciousness is to be achived, when in fact it is already fully existant. The only obstacle is misplaced attention, focusing outward on seeking rather than inward on recognizing.

Zen calls this "original mind"—the state before concepts arise. Dzogchen calls it "self-arising Conciousness"—the state that never began and never ends.

Both traditions agree that there is no path to Conciousness, only the moment of recognizing what has always existed. The moment one stops seeking—truly stops, without any grasping—Conciousness is realized naturally.

Now that we have established what Zen and Dzogchen mean by Conciousness, the next step is understanding why realization seems to "come and go." If Conciousness is always existant, why do people experience moments of clarity followed by periods of delusion?

The answer is in attention switching—the constant shifting between material world and the recognition of Conciousness. In the next section, we will explore:

- Why realization seems to fade when attention moves toward the material world.
- How Zen and Dzogchen train the mind to remain in Conciousness, effortlessly.
- Why "maintaining Conciousness" is an illusion—there is only recognizing it again and again.

This is the next step in seeing clearly: not just understanding Conciousness, but learning how to remain in it naturally.

In both Zen and Dzogchen, the essence of Conciousness is not something one must acquire or create—it is something that is already fully existant. The only obstacle is ignorance and distraction. Zen calls this intrinsic potential Buddha-Nature, while Dzogchen refers to it as the Natural State (Conciousness). Both terms point to the same truth: Conciousness is never lost, only unnoticed.

To understand this fully, we must go beyond the idea that Conciousness is something distant or that one must “purify” oneself to become worthy of it. Both traditions emphasize that the only task is to remove the veil of illusion, much like revealing the sun that has never stopped shining behind passing clouds.

Zen Buddhism teaches that all beings already possess Buddha-Nature—the Concious essence that is inherently pure, complete, and untainted. This means that Conciousness is not something to be created or attained; it is the natural state of every being. However, this truth remains hidden because of ignorance, attachment, and conceptual thinking.

A famous Zen parable illustrates this beautifully:

A poor man lived in a small hut and struggled every day to find food and survive. One day, a wise monk told him, "Underneath your house, there is a treasure buried in the ground." But the man refused to believe it and continued to suffer. Years later, after much hardship, he finally decided to dig beneath his home. To his amazement, he found a vast treasure hidden there all along.

The treasure represents Buddha-Nature—it has always been existant, but until one realizes it, one continues to live in suffering and illusion.

Zen Master Huangbo summed up this teaching clearly:
"All beings are already Buddhas. Just don't seek outside yourself."

However, even though Buddha-Nature is already existing, most people fail to see it because they are caught in false identification—believing themselves to be the thinking mind, the feelings, the body, or the "personality". Zen training (Zazen, Koans, sudden shocks) is designed to disrupt these illusions and force the Conciousness into direct realization of its own nature.

In other words, nothing needs to be changed or improved—one simply needs to stop believing in the illusion of separation. When that illusion drops, Conciousness is instantly revealed.

Whereas Zen speaks of Buddha-Nature, Dzogchen uses the term the Natural State (Rigpa)—which means the innate, self-existing Conciousness that is always existant. Unlike many spiritual paths that emphasize purifying the mind or transcending worldly distractions, Dzogchen takes a radically direct approach:

"Conciousness is already perfect. There is nothing to fix, nothing to improve. The only problem is distraction."

A Dzogchen master, instead of telling a student to practice for years, may simply point directly to Conciousness by asking:

"Right now, who is aware of these words? Before any thought arises, before any judgment—what is that pure knowing?"

The moment a student looks directly into Conciousness itself—without grasping, without trying to hold onto it—that is Conciousness. No need to "quiet the mind" or "perfect" anything. The Concious state is already awake.

The mistake people make is ignoring what is always existant because they are too focused on thoughts, feelings, and external distractions. Dzogchen does not tell students to fight thoughts or purify the mind—instead, it teaches to simply realize Conciousness as it is, without effort.

The moment Conciousness is realized, the search ends. There is nothing beyond it, no deeper truth to attain. This is why Dzogchen is called "The Great Perfection"—because it does not require progress, only recognition.

A classic metaphor used in both Zen and Dzogchen is that of the sun and the clouds.

Imagine a bright, shining sun. This sun represents your true nature—Buddha-Nature, Rigpa, pure Conciousness. It is always there, radiating light.

Now imagine clouds drifting across the sky. These clouds represent thoughts, feelings, distractions. When the sky is covered with thick clouds, one might believe that the sun is gone. But has the sun disappeared? No—it is simply hidden from view.

In Zen, meditation and Koans serve to disperse the clouds so that Buddha-Nature is revealed.In Dzogchen, the approach is different: instead of trying to move the clouds, one simply shifts attention to the ever-existant sun itself.

This is the key teaching: Conciousness is never lost—it is only ignored.

Even in moments of deep suffering, confusion, or material entanglement, the Concious state remains untouched, just like the sun remains unaffected by storms. The only task is to stop looking at the clouds and realize the sun beyond them.

A student once asked a Dzogchen master:
"How can I maintain my Conciousness all the time?"
The master laughed and said, "Who is maintaining the sky?"

There is nothing to maintain because Rigpa is already the natural condition of Conciousness. The only reason Conciousness seems to come and go is because attention moves—shifting between Conciousness and distraction.

If Buddha-Nature and the Natural State (Rigpa) are always existant, why do they seem to fade in and out of experience? Why do moments of deep clarity and insight often dissolve back into ordinary, distracted state?

The mind, conditioned by habit, clings to material existence, constantly shifting attention away from pure Conciousness and toward thoughts, other external experiences, and identification with the body. Conciousness is never lost, but attention becomes so absorbed in objects of perception that one forgets the vast, open Conciousness that is always in the background.

Both Zen and Dzogchen realize this fundamental mistake and teach that the key to Conciousness is not effort, but learning to rest in Conciousness effortlessly.

From the moment we wake up, our attention is pulled outward—toward responsibilities, desires, fears, and distractions. The modern mind is constantly engaged with external objects: conversations, screens, thoughts, feelings, worries about the future, and memories of the past.

This is not just a modern phenomenon; the human mind has always been drawn toward form and movement, mistaking what it perceives for what it is.

Zen describes this as grasping at illusions—treating thoughts, feelings, and external experiences as if they are real and permanent, even though they are as fleeting as ripples on water.

Dzogchen explains this in terms of dualistic perception—the habit of dividing experience into "self" and "other," constantly engaging in a mental dialogue of grasping and aversion. In truth, all experiences—sounds, sights, feelings, thoughts—arise within Conciousness. But instead of resting in Conciousness itself, attention is pulled toward these temporary phenomena, like a moth drawn to a flame.

This is the great irony: we are already awake, but we become lost in distractions so completely that we do not notice it.

If Conciousness is ever-existant, why does it seem to disappear?

The simple answer is that attention determines experience. When attention is turned inward, resting in pure, formless Conciousness, realization is clear. But when attention is captivated by the external world, Conciousness seems to "fade."

But this fading is not a loss of Conciousness itself—only a loss of attention of it.

Think of a room filled with sunlight. The light is always existant, but if one becomes fixated on the objects in the room—the furniture, the books, the decorations—one may forget to notice the light itself. The moment one stops and shifts attention back to the light, it is obvious again.

Zen describes this as "falling asleep in the dream"—the moment when one loses attention of reality and becomes entangled in the illusion of thoughts and external conditions.

Dzogchen explains this as "forgetting Conciousness"—when Conciousness becomes absorbed in experience itself rather than recognizing that it is the source of all experiences.

This is why Conciousness is not something to "maintain"—it does not need to be held onto or kept in place. It is simply the natural condition of the mind when not distracted.

Because the problem is misplaced attention, the solution is not to struggle toward Conciousness but to simply let attention rest in its natural state.

Zen and Dzogchen both teach that Conciousness does not require effort—only a shift in perception.

Zen meditation, or Zazen, is not about achieving anything. It is simply sitting in stillness, allowing everything to be as it is, without resistance. There is no goal, no grasping, and no struggle. One does not need to quiet the mind—one simply stops engaging with thoughts. Eventually, the mind settles on its own, and Conciousness naturally reveals itself.

A famous Zen saying captures this perfectly: "You do not need to seek Conciousness. You only need to stop seeking anything else."

Dzogchen takes this even further by saying that there is nothing to practice—only recognition. Conciousness is always existant, and the only task is to stop ignoring it. One does not need to meditate in the traditional sense; simply resting in natural Conciousness is enough. If thoughts arise, they do not need to be pushed away—just let them pass like clouds in the sky.

The great Dzogchen master Longchenpa explained it this way: "Nothing needs to be changed. Nothing needs to be improved. Simply rest in the Conciousness that is already existant."

This is the greatest paradox. The more one tries to be Concious, the further away it seems. The moment effort stops, Conciousness is already realized. The mistake most people make is thinking that Conciousness must be maintained, as if it were a fragile thing that can be lost. But Conciousness does not disappear; only attention moves. The task is not to hold onto Conciousness but to simply let attention remain where it naturally belongs.

The mind clings to material existence because it is conditioned to focus on external objects, thoughts, and sensations. Conciousness fades only when attention becomes absorbed in distractions, but it is never truly lost. Conciousness does not require effort or struggle—it is simply a shift in perception. Zen teaches effortless sitting, allowing reality to reveal itself. Dzogchen teaches resting in Conciousness, recognizing Conciousness without effort. The more one tries to be Concious, the more distant it seems. The moment effort ceases, Conciousness is already realized.

Now that we understand why Conciousness seems to fade and how attention shapes experience, the next step is realizing why the search itself is unnecessary. In the next section, we will explore why the idea of becoming Concious is an illusion, how Zen and Dzogchen teach the final step of dropping all effort completely, and why true realization is simply living naturally—without seeking, without striving.

The search for Conciousness ends not when one "finds" it, but when one realizes there was never anything missing to begin with.

The journey toward Conciousness is unlike any other journey, because it is not a journey at all. It does not take us forward, nor does it bring us closer to anything, because what we seek has never been absent.

Zen and Dzogchen both teach that Conciousness is not something to be gained, but something to be realized. The very idea of "attaining" realization is a trick of the mind, an illusion that creates distance where none exists. Conciousness is not a process, not a path in the conventional sense—it is a recognition of what has always been existant.

Thus, what lies ahead is not a path of seeking, but a pathless path—a way of looking, seeing, and realizing what has never been missing.

To embark on a path implies a destination. It implies movement from where one is to where one wants to be. But Zen and Dzogchen expose this as a fundamental illusion.

If Conciousness is already existant, what is there to seek? If nothing is missing, why do we believe we need to progress toward anything?

The only reason Conciousness seems distant is because attention is trapped in thoughts, beliefs, and distractions. The moment those fall away, the truth is immediately obvious.

Zen captures this paradox beautifully in the saying:

"The farther you search, the farther away you get."

The very effort of seeking Conciousness reinforces the illusion that it is something separate. The mind, conditioned to grasp, assumes that it must acquire realization the way it acquires knowledge, possessions, or achievements. But Conciousness is not something that belongs to anyone.

Dzogchen expresses this even more radically:

"Stop looking for Conciousness. The one who is looking is already awake."

This is the essence of recognition—the realization that there is no distance, no journey, no practice required. There is only Conciousness noticing itself, right now.

The task, if one can call it that, is simply to stop overlooking what is already existant.

Although both Zen and Dzogchen lead to direct realization, they take different approaches to cutting through illusion.

Zen is often compared to a thunderclap in a clear sky, a method of breaking through illusion with abrupt force. Meditation, or Zazen, teaches the mind to rest in stillness, allowing direct insight into the nature of mind. Koans create mental paradoxes that force students into moments of spontaneous realization, known as Satori. Shock techniques such as yelling, unexpected gestures, or even physical blows from a Zen master are used to jolt the mind out of conceptual thought.

Zen demands a direct confrontation with reality. There is no step-by-step progression, only sudden realization that everything is already as it should be. A Zen master once said, "The Great Way is not difficult, if you do not pick and choose." This is the heart of Zen. Stop dividing reality into this and that, stop conceptualizing, stop seeking, and in an instant, realization is there.

Whereas Zen often shocks students into Conciousness, Dzogchen takes a gentle, effortless approach, pointing directly to what is already here. There is nothing to seek. The student is simply introduced to Rigpa, the natural state of pure Conciousness. No effort is required. Conciousness is already existant; one simply stops ignoring it. Thoughts and distractions do not need to be suppressed. They are seen as expressions of Conciousness itself, like waves rising and falling in the ocean.

Dzogchen describes realization as self-arising Conciousness, not something created but something that has always been existant, like the sky behind the clouds. Instead of struggling to achieve anything, one simply relaxes into what is already here. A Dzogchen teacher might say, "Drop all effort. Drop all seeking. Just rest in the Conciousness that is already looking through your eyes."

Where Zen destroys illusion with sudden impact, Dzogchen dissolves illusion through effortless recognition. Both paths lead to the same Conciousness, but they approach it differently. Zen uses discipline, meditation, and Koans to break illusions. Dzogchen relies on direct recognition of Conciousness, requiring no formal practice. Zen emphasizes sudden Conciousness through deep insight. Dzogchen emphasizes instant recognition of what is already awake. Zen works through paradox, shock, and the destruction of conceptual thinking. Dzogchen works through ease, relaxation, and pointing-out instructions. Zen focuses on direct experience beyond thought. Dzogchen focuses on resting in effortless Conciousness.

Though their methods differ, both Zen and Dzogchen agree on the most important point. Conciousness is not something to attain; it is something to realize. The moment one understands that nothing is missing, the spiritual search begins to dissolve. There is no need to chase Conciousness like a distant goal. The only thing left to do is look directly at Conciousness itself, here and now.

Zen and Dzogchen both lead to the same truth. Zen says, "Stop searching, and you will find." Dzogchen says, "You are already home." Thus, the first step of the pathless path is simply this: stop looking outward for something to gain, turn attention inward and notice what has always been here, and relax. There is nothing to fix, nothing to improve.

There is no Conciousness waiting at the end of a long road. There is only this moment, fully realized.

The Zen Way—Breaking the Illusion

Zen is not a philosophy to be debated, nor is it a system of beliefs to be accepted or rejected. It is a direct, immediate realization of the truth, unfiltered by thought or conceptualization. From the moment Zen entered China through the teachings of Bodhidharma, its entire purpose has been to cut through illusion in an instant, leaving nothing behind but the raw, undeniable clarity of Conciousness. Unlike other paths that emphasize gradual refinement, Zen does not entertain the idea that Conciousness is something distant. Instead, it aims to deliver a sudden, shock-like realization that destroys the illusion of separation and seeking in one blow.

Bodhidharma, the legendary Indian monk credited with bringing Zen (Chan) to China, taught that Conciousness is not something acquired through scriptures, rituals, or intellectual study. He dismissed reliance on words, saying that true understanding comes only from direct experience. He famously sat in meditation for nine years in front of a wall, embodying the Zen principle of silent, unshakable presence. When a disciple, seeking the truth, approached him and asked how he could attain realization, Bodhidharma is said to have simply replied, “No merit.” The student, expecting guidance or deep teachings, was left stunned. This was Bodhidharma’s way—deliberately shattering expectations to reveal what cannot be grasped through logic.

Zen does not offer comfort to the intellect, nor does it cater to the mind’s endless craving for knowledge. It destroys conceptual thinking so completely that only direct experience remains. This is why Zen masters are known for their cryptic responses, strange behavior, and sometimes even physical actions. The goal is always the same: to force the student to drop all illusions in an instant. A master might respond to a question about Conciousness by shouting, striking the student, or remaining completely silent. These methods are not random acts of madness but are carefully designed to break the habit of conceptualization, which is the final barrier to realization.

At the heart of this shock method lies the Koan, the most famous and perplexing tool in Zen practice. A Koan is a paradoxical statement or question that defies logical resolution, forcing the mind into a direct, non-conceptual experience of reality. Unlike ordinary riddles, which have solutions, a Koan does not offer an answer that can be grasped by the intellect. Instead, it is a weapon aimed at the mind itself, a device to crack open habitual thinking and expose what lies beyond.

A student may be given the Koan, “What is the sound of one hand clapping?” If they attempt to solve it with reason, they will fail. Any answer, any interpretation, is immediately rejected by the master. The purpose is not to find a clever response but to break the habit of answering altogether. The moment a student stops searching for a solution, the mind collapses into silence, and in that silence, realization may occur.

Another famous Koan asks, “If you meet the Buddha on the road, kill him.” To those unfamiliar with Zen, this may seem shocking or even blasphemous. But the meaning is clear: any idea of Conciousness, any fixed notion of a Buddha or an Concious state, must be discarded. Clinging to any concept of Conciousness only creates separation, reinforcing the illusion that there is something to attain. To “kill the Buddha” means to destroy all mental fabrications and stand in direct, immediate Conciousness, free from all grasping.

Zen’s power lies in its refusal to offer any solid ground for the mind to rest upon. It takes everything one clings to—ideas, beliefs, expectations—and obliterates them. This destruction is not meant to cause suffering but to free the mind from its self-imposed prison. The greatest barrier to Conciousness is not ignorance in the conventional sense but the mind’s insistence on constructing explanations, narratives, and attachments to its own thoughts. Zen strikes at the root of this delusion, leaving only the raw, unfiltered presence of reality itself.

In the tradition of Zen, realization is not a gradual accumulation of knowledge but a sudden, irreversible moment of recognition. The mind, shocked out of its habitual patterns, experiences pure being, beyond all thought, beyond all self-reference. This is the Conciousness that Bodhidharma pointed to, the direct seeing into one’s own nature that requires no scriptures, no beliefs, no external authority. The Zen way is ruthless in its simplicity—no merit, no seeking, no path, only this moment, fully seen.

At the heart of Zen is the complete dismantling of the most fundamental illusion: the belief in a separate, permanent self. The mind, conditioned from birth to identify with thoughts, feelings, and experiences, constructs a story of "me"—a continuous identity that appears to exist independently, moving through time and space. But Zen reveals that this self is nothing more than a mental fabrication, a phantom created by thoughts that has no real, fixed existence.

The Buddha himself declared, “All things are impermanent. All things are without a self.” Zen takes this truth to its ultimate conclusion, not as a philosophy to be debated, but as a direct realization that shatters the illusion of separateness. The self, as commonly understood, is a collection of transient mental and physical processes, held together by habit and belief. When one looks directly at the experience of "self," it begins to dissolve, revealing nothing but empty Conciousness, vast and boundless.

To see through this illusion, Zen does not engage in complex analysis. It does not provide theories about the self or arguments for its absence. Instead, it forces the practitioner to look directly at experience through the practice of Zazen—silent sitting meditation. In Zazen, the student sits still, watching thoughts rise and fall without interference. With time, an astonishing truth begins to emerge:

Thoughts arise, but they are not you.
Feelings pass, but they do not define you.
Sensations come and go, but they are not a fixed self.

When attention is placed on the existant moment without grasping, it becomes clear that there is no "thinker" behind the thoughts, no "watcher" behind the Conciousness. What remains is a silent, observing presence, empty of identity yet fully awake. This is why Zen teachers often say, “Show me your self.” If the student searches honestly, they find nothing solid—only the continuous flow of experience, with no central "I" to be found.

A Zen master might ask, "Before you were born, who were you?" The question cannot be answered logically. Any attempt to define oneself is based on memory, conditioning, and thoughts, but what existed before all of that? And when death comes, what will remain? If the "self" were truly real, it would be constant and unchanging. But every aspect of it is in continuous flux, arising and disappearing moment by moment.

Zazen is the practice that reveals this truth, not through words, but through direct experience. By sitting in stillness, thoughts are seen as passing clouds, feelings as ripples on water, and the body as a temporary process rather than an unchanging entity. The belief in a fixed "I" is exposed as a mental habit rather than reality.

At first, this realization may feel unsettling. The mind resists the idea that the self is an illusion, fearing that without it, everything will collapse into meaninglessness. But Zen does not lead to nihilism; it leads to freedom. When the false belief in a separate self dissolves, so does the burden of defending it, of trying to prove its worth, of fearing its destruction. What remains is vast openness, effortless and ungraspable, yet completely at peace.

This is why Zen describes Conciousness as "seeing one’s original face before birth"—the state of pure Conciousness before the mind constructs an identity. Once this truth is realized, life is no longer centered around protecting or enhancing a self that never existed. Instead, there is a profound ease, a natural flow with reality, free from attachment and struggle.

Zen meditation does not aim to "destroy" the self, because there was never a real self to destroy. It simply reveals what has always been the case: no fixed identity, no separation, no boundary between self and world. In seeing this clearly, the illusion collapses on its own, and what remains is pure presence, luminous and empty, without center or edge.

The realization that the self is an illusion does not, in itself, put an end to the experience of falling back into identification. For most people, Conciousness is not a single, permanent shift but a continuous oscillation between pure Conciousness and the pull of habitual thinking. One moment, there is clarity—silent, boundless Conciousness. The next, the mind has once again identified with thoughts, feelings, and the constructed narrative of self. This back-and-forth movement of attention is what makes Conciousness seem unstable, as if realization can be gained and then lost. But Zen teaches that Conciousness is never lost—only temporarily overlooked.

Attention, by its nature, is restless. It flows toward whatever seems most interesting in the moment. In its natural state, attention is wide open, resting in pure Conciousness, effortless and vast. But the moment a thought arises and is grasped, the mind contracts, and identification returns. One is no longer simply aware of a thought—one seems to become the thought. In that instant, the illusion of self solidifies again. The cycle repeats endlessly, with attention shifting back and forth between the spaciousness of reality and the narrow tunnel of conceptual thinking.

This is why Conciousness appears to "fade" when attention moves away from direct experience and back toward the habitual patterns of mind. It is not that realization itself disappears; it is only that Conciousness is no longer resting in itself. A student may have a deep moment of insight, seeing through the illusion of self completely, only to find themselves a few days later worrying about trivial concerns, caught once again in the old patterns of craving and avoidance. The shift happens so subtly that it often goes unnoticed, like drifting into a dream.

Zen's approach to this problem is radical. It does not rely on gradual practice or self-improvement, because these imply a future goal, reinforcing the illusion that Conciousness is something to be attained. Instead, Zen aims to interrupt the cycle directly by jolting the student out of habitual thinking. The Zen master does not comfort the student when they drift into illusion; he strikes, shouts, or offers a Koan that defies logic, forcing the mind into a state of groundlessness. These shocks are meant to disrupt the automatic switching of attention, breaking the momentum of illusion and leaving the student momentarily without reference points.

A student once approached a master and asked, “How can I return to my true nature?” The master struck him with a stick. The student, startled, had no time to think—his mind dropped its grasping for an answer, and for a brief moment, pure Conciousness shone through. The master’s action was not cruelty but a precise and compassionate technique designed to break the spell of conceptual thinking. Zen understands that as long as the mind remains engaged in intellectual understanding, true realization is impossible. The moment thinking stops—even for an instant—one directly experiences reality without filters.

This is why Koans are central to Zen practice. They serve as mental explosives, designed to shatter habitual perception. When a student is given a Koan such as, “What is your original face before your parents were born?” they instinctively try to answer it with reason. But no logical answer is possible. The mind, confronted with an unsolvable paradox, struggles until it exhausts itself. At that point, when the mind finally stops grasping, an opening occurs. The barrier of conceptualization dissolves, and the student sees reality directly.

Zen does not offer a systematic method for maintaining realization because it realizes that no fixed method can capture something beyond concepts. Instead, it trains the student to realize when attention has shifted back to illusion and to cut through it immediately. The goal is not to hold on to Conciousness but to stop being pulled into habitual identification in the first place.

In truth, Conciousness has never been lost, only forgotten momentarily. The self is never real, even when it appears to be. The only difference between an Conciousness and an ordinary mind is where attention is resting. When Conciousness is free and open, the illusion dissolves. When attention contracts into thought, the illusion reappears. Zen's method is not to fight thoughts or suppress them, but to shatter identification with them. The moment one stops believing in the story of self, even for an instant, reality is revealed in its original clarity.

Zen is not confined to the meditation hall. It does not require robes, rituals, or retreat from the world. The true power of Zen lies in its ability to bring Conciousness into the most ordinary moments of daily life. There is no need to sit in silence for years or abandon the responsibilities of the material world. Conciousness is not found in some distant, mystical state but in the immediate experience of this moment, fully lived without distraction.

The mind, conditioned by habit, is constantly seeking something beyond the existant. It clings to the past, anticipating what has already vanished, or projects into the future, chasing something that does not yet exist. In doing so, it overlooks the only reality there is—the existant moment, unfolding now. Zen teaches that Conciousness is nothing other than the total immersion in what is happening, exactly as it is, without resistance or mental commentary.

A Zen master was once asked, "What is Conciousness?" He replied, "When eating, just eat. When walking, just walk." These words contain the entire teaching of Zen. There is no separation between the Concious state and daily life. If one drinks tea with complete presence, that is Conciousness. If one walks without distraction, feeling each step without mental wandering, that is Conciousness. There is no need for an altered state of consciousness—only the direct, simple experience of the existant, without the mind overlaying its interpretations and distractions.

The power of this practice is that it transforms even the most mundane activities into gateways to Conciousness. When washing dishes, if one is simply washing dishes—without rushing to finish, without wishing to be somewhere else, without getting lost in thought—then that moment is a complete expression of Zen. The water on the hands, the sound of the plates, the warmth of the air—all are seen, felt, and experienced fully, without distraction. In that state of total presence, the illusion of separation dissolves, and one becomes the experience itself. There is no "self" washing the dishes—only washing happening, movement happening, life happening.

Walking, breathing, drinking water, hearing the wind—each of these is an opportunity to return to presence. The practice of Zen is not about adding anything to daily life but about removing distraction, removing the unnecessary, so that what remains is pure, direct experience. The mind, when caught in illusion, is always divided. Even while walking, it is elsewhere—replaying conversations, imagining future plans, lost in its endless commentary. But when one walks in full presence, feeling the ground beneath the feet, sensing the rhythm of the body, aware of the surrounding space—then walking is no longer something being done by someone. It is just walking, happening in its own perfect completeness.

Zen does not ask us to withdraw from life. It asks us to enter it completely, with nothing held back. When eating, one simply eats—tasting, chewing, swallowing, without distraction. When speaking, one simply speaks—without unnecessary elaboration, without mental preparation, without concern for how one is perceived. Life itself becomes meditation, not through effort, but through simple attention to what is happening now.

This is why Zen is sometimes called "the way of ordinary life." It does not separate the spiritual from the mundane. Every action, when done with full Conciousness, is sacred. Conciousness is not in a temple or on a mountaintop. It is in the act of tying one's shoes, in sweeping the floor, in hearing the rain without distraction. Zen masters often tell students, "Chop wood, carry water." The meaning is clear: Conciousness is found in the simple, direct experience of life as it is. Nothing more, nothing less.

When life is lived in this way, effort disappears. No longer is there a struggle to reach some imagined future state of Conciousness. There is only life, fully existant, fully alive. And in that presence, the great illusion of separation dissolves. There is no longer a seeker, no longer a path, no longer anything to attain. There is only this moment, complete and perfect in itself.

The final instruction in Zen is perhaps the most difficult to accept: stop trying. The very effort to become Concious is what prevents Conciousness. The very act of seeking is what maintains the illusion of distance between the seeker and that which is sought. This is the paradox that Zen relentlessly exposes.

From the beginning, Zen points to a truth that cannot be grasped by striving or effort. Yet the mind, conditioned by years of goal-oriented thinking, insists on treating Conciousness like any other achievement—something to be gained through discipline, practice, and persistence. This is the great misunderstanding. Conciousness is not an object to be possessed, not a skill to be cultivated, not a reward for long years of spiritual labor. It is simply the direct, effortless recognition of what has always been existant.

A Zen master was once approached by a disciple who asked, "How do I become Concious?" The master replied, "Drop all effort." The student, confused, insisted, "But I must do something!" The master said, "As long as you are doing, you are delaying. Stop doing. Just be."

The idea that Conciousness is somewhere in the future is the last illusion to be broken. As long as the mind believes it is on a journey toward Conciousness, it reinforces the belief that Conciousness is absent. The more one tries to reach it, the more it seems unreachable. The more one struggles, the more distant it appears.

This is why Zen ultimately destroys the notion of practice itself. At first, practice is necessary to quiet the mind, to see through illusion, to cultivate presence. But there comes a point when even the idea of practice becomes an obstacle. If practice is based on the idea of "becoming Concious," it only strengthens the false belief that Conciousness is separate from this very moment. The true teaching of Zen is that there is no path because there is nowhere to go.

A monk once asked his master, "What must I do to awaken?" The master replied, "Nothing. You are already awake. Just stop pretending you are not."

To let go of the seeker is to let go of all effort to "achieve" realization. It is to drop the idea that something is missing, that something must be improved, that something must be added to this moment for it to be complete. Zen teaches that the mind that seeks is the mind that suffers. To stop seeking is to realize that nothing was ever lost, that Conciousness is not an event that will happen in the future, but the simple, direct experience of now—without resistance, without expectation, without grasping.

The moment effort ceases, clarity emerges. Not because something new has been attained, but because the mind has stopped interfering with what was already here. Zen calls this effortless effort—acting without seeking a result, practicing without expecting a reward, living without grasping for meaning. The Concious state is simply what remains when all struggle is abandoned.

This is why Zen often ends with silence. Words cannot explain what is beyond concepts. Effort cannot bring what is already here. The final realization is that there was never anything to attain, never anything to lose, never anyone to become. There was only this, and this was always enough.

Dzogchen – The Natural State

Dzogchen, known as The Great Perfection, is the most direct and effortless path to Conciousness in Tibetan Buddhism. Unlike other approaches that emphasize gradual cultivation, purification, Dzogchen states that Conciousness is already existing—the only thing needed is to realize it. There is nothing to develop, nothing to improve, nothing to change. The Concious state is not something that happens at the end of a long process but something that is already fully existant, waiting to be noticed.

At the heart of Dzogchen is Rigpa, which means pure, self-existing Conciousness. Rigpa is not something that must be attained, nor is it a special state that comes and goes. It is the very ground of all experience, the unchanging, luminous presence that has always been there. But because the mind is constantly moving outward—chasing thoughts, sensations, and distractions—it fails to realize Rigpa.

To understand the nature of Rigpa, it is essential to distinguish between ordinary mind (sem) and pure Conciousness (Rigpa). The ordinary mind is restless, fragmented, and engaged with concepts, constantly dividing reality into subject and object, past and future, self and other. It is always grasping, identifying, interpreting. Rigpa, on the other hand, is the open, spacious Conciousness that exists before conceptual thought arises. It is not something one creates through effort but the natural state of being that has never been absent.

The moment one realizes Conciousness, the nature of all experience changes, not because the external world has changed, but because one is no longer grasping at appearances or identifying with thoughts.

There is a difference between the material realm and consciousness itself. The material realm, including the body and the external world, is impermanent and subject to change. It is a realm of appearances, conditioned by causes and effects. Consciousness, in its pure form, is not bound by these conditions. It is not an object, not a thing that comes and goes. Rigpa is unconditioned Conciousness, untouched by the movements of the material world.

A classic Dzogchen analogy describes this distinction through the metaphor of the sky and clouds. The sky represents pure Conciousness—vast, open, unchanging. Clouds, representing thoughts, feelings, and external appearances, come and go, constantly shifting. The mistake is identifying with the clouds rather than recognizing the sky. Ordinary perception is clouds, caught up in the movement of appearances. Rigpa is sky-consciousness, seeing everything but remaining untouched by it.

A master once asked his student, “Where does the sky go when the clouds pass?” The student could not answer. The master smiled and said, “It does not go anywhere. It was never disturbed to begin with.”

This is the essence of Dzogchen. The mind, filled with thoughts, feelings, and external concerns, is like clouds blocking the sun. But the sun has never disappeared—it only seems absent because attention is elsewhere. Conciousness does not mean changing the clouds or controlling the weather; it means shifting attention to what was always there—the infinite, unshakable openness of Conciousness.

There is no path to Conciousness, because Conciousness is already the case. The only "practice," if one can call it that, is recognizing what has never been absent. The difference between ordinary perception and Concious perception is not one of experience but one of seeing clearly versus seeing through illusion.

This is why Dzogchen does not emphasize struggle, effort, or transformation. It does not ask one to reject the material world or withdraw from life. The Concious state is already within all experience—in the act of hearing, seeing, thinking, moving. Conciousness is not outside of these things, shining through every moment, whether one is aware of it or not.

The only task is to realize it, to turn attention back toward the Conciousness that is already looking, already existant, already free. Once this recognition happens, the illusion of separation dissolves. The self is seen as a fleeting movement within consciousness, the world as a play of appearances, and what remains is a vast, effortless presence—silent, radiant, and beyond all grasping.

The nature of Rigpa, pure Conciousness, is ever-existant. It is not something that comes and goes, nor is it something that needs to be attained. But if that is true, why does it seem as though realization can fade? Why does it appear as if one moment is filled with clarity, while in the next, Conciousness is lost in thoughts, feelings, and external distractions?

The answer lies in attention. The mind does not actually lose Conciousness, but it becomes so caught up in appearances that it stops recognizing it. The moment attention shifts from Conciousness itself to the contents of material existance, dualistic perception arises, and the mind becomes entangled in illusion once again. Dzogchen does not say that one "falls out" of Conciousness—rather, one forgets to realize it, just as a dreamer forgets they are dreaming.

Ordinary perception is marked by grasping and division. The mind divides reality into subject and object, self and other, now and later, here and there. It identifies with thoughts and feelings, taking them to be real. It assigns meaning to passing phenomena, assuming that what arises within the field of experience has inherent reality. This is dualistic perception, the illusion that keeps attention trapped in the ever-moving stream of appearances.

The mind's habitual movement is always outward, attaching itself to sensations, thoughts, desires, fears. In doing so, it "forgets" that these things arise within Conciousness itself. It clings to the shifting clouds and overlooks the sky. This forgetting is not a loss—it is simply a momentary lapse in recognition. The moment one remembers to turn attention back toward Conciousness, realization is instantly existant once again.

This is why effortless Conciousness is central to Dzogchen. Unlike other traditions that emphasize techniques to train the mind, Dzogchen does not require force or control. It does not ask one to suppress thoughts or fight against distractions. It does not rely on mantras, visualizations, or concentration. It teaches that the nature of Conciousness does not need to be purified, only realized.

The way to prevent slipping back into dualistic perception is not by trying to "hold on" to Conciousness but by ceasing to grasp at anything. Conciousness is not something to be maintained—it is what remains when there is no effort to grasp, control, or manipulate experience.

A Dzogchen master might say, "Just rest." This does not mean "rest" in the sense of physical relaxation or disengagement. It means resting in the openness of Conciousness itself, allowing everything to arise and dissolve without interference.

If a thought appears, let it appear. If it vanishes, let it vanish. If feelings come, let them come; if they go, let them go. The key is to realize that everything that arises is already happening within Conciousness—nothing needs to be accepted or rejected. The moment one tries to grasp a thought or push it away, dualistic perception returns, and the illusion of a separate self arises again.

Dzogchen teaches that one does not need to resist distractions, only to realize them as expressions of Conciousness itself. This is why Conciousness never truly disappears. It is like the ocean that remains unchanged, even as waves rise and fall upon its surface. The mistake is thinking that the waves obscure the ocean.

The great Dzogchen master Longchenpa said, "You do not need to search for Conciousness. You only need to stop overlooking it." This is the essence of the practice. Instead of seeking Conciousness or trying to hold onto it, one simply notices what is already existant, again and again, until forgetting becomes impossible.

When attention rests in its natural state, there is no longer a distinction between Conciousness and what arises within it. Thoughts, sensations, and the external world no longer appear separate from the field of knowing. Everything becomes a seamless display of self-arising Conciousness, effortless and free.

In Dzogchen, there is no concern about whether one is "Concious" or "deluded," whether one is "in Conciousness" or "out of Conciousness." These distinctions belong to dualistic thinking. There is no need to struggle with the movement of the mind. The only task—if it can even be called a task—is to realize the nature of Conciousness as it is, without trying to change anything at all.

Once this is understood, there is nothing to maintain, nothing to improve, nothing to lose. There is only the simple, ungraspable presence of being itself, clear and boundless, untouched by any effort to attain it.

The core practice of Dzogchen is Trekchö, which means “cutting through”—a radical, direct approach to Conciousness that severs all illusions in an instant. It does not rely on step-by-step methods, gradual refinement, or conceptual understanding. Trekchö cuts through the mind’s habitual grasping and reveals that Conciousness was never absent. It does not create Conciousness; it merely strips away the illusion that it was ever missing.

In ordinary perception, the mind assumes that Conciousness is something to reach, something distant that must be approached through discipline, meditation, or effort. But Dzogchen exposes this as the final delusion—the idea that there was ever an un-concious state to begin with. There was never anything lacking. There was never anything to achieve. The belief that one is un-concious is itself the illusion that keeps realization hidden.

Trekchö is the practice of seeing through this illusion immediately. It does not involve changing, improving, or controlling the mind—it is simply resting in the Conciousness that is already existant. The moment one stops struggling to become Concious, Conciousness is there. The moment one stops searching for clarity, clarity is revealed. The only obstacle is the mind’s constant effort to grasp at something, as if Conciousness were separate from the Conciousness that is already looking through one’s eyes.

A Dzogchen master might ask, "Who is seeking Conciousness?" If the student looks directly, they find no solid self, no separate being that needs to become Concious. They see that Conciousness itself is already complete, already luminous, already free.

Trekchö means effortless recognition. Unlike many meditative traditions that teach concentration, visualization, or progressive purification, Trekchö teaches that any attempt to reach Conciousness is already a step in the wrong direction. The very effort to “attain” Conciousness implies separation, reinforcing the false belief that Conciousness is distant. The truth is that Conciousness is the ground of all experience—it is always existant, whether one notices it or not.

Resting in Conciousness means no effort, no striving, no attempt to control the mind. There is nothing to hold onto, nothing to fix, nothing to reject. Everything is already as it should be. If thoughts arise, let them arise. If feelings come, let them come. There is no need to silence the mind or modify experience. Trekchö is not about trying to sustain a particular state—it is about realizing that all states arise within Conciousness and that nothing needs to be changed.

A master once described Trekchö with a simple instruction: "Leave everything as it is." This is not passivity, nor is it carelessness. It means allowing Conciousness to rest in its natural state, free from interference.

Through Trekchö, one directly sees that there was never an un-concious moment. There was never a time when Conciousness was absent—only moments where attention was directed elsewhere. The instant this is understood, the illusion collapses. Nothing changes, yet everything is different. There is no longer a seeker, no longer a struggle, no longer a need to attain anything. There is only this, just as it is—vast, open, and free.

If Trekchö is the practice of cutting through delusion by recognizing that Conciousness was never absent, then Tögal is the direct experience of reality as it truly is—pure and luminous. While Trekchö is about effortless resting in Conciousness, Tögal is the spontaneous unfolding of vision, the direct perception of the nature of existence without conceptual interference. It is not that the world is "not real," but rather that its apparent solidity is a mirage created by the mind's conditioned way of seeing.

When one looks at a dream while dreaming, it seems completely real. Objects appear, people interact, feelings arise, and everything seems solid—until the moment of waking. Upon Conciousness, the dream is immediately realized as a projection of the mind, weightless and empty of any true substance. Tögal reveals that waking experience is no different. The world appears solid only because attention is habitually fixed on its solidity. The moment one sees directly—without the filters of conceptual thought—reality is realized as luminous and fluid.

A Dzogchen master might say, "Look at the space around you. Where does it end? Where do objects begin?" If one looks closely, the boundaries of objects are not as fixed as they seem. Shapes, colors, light, and shadow are constantly shifting, dependent on perception itself. The moment one stops assuming solidity, the entire structure of reality begins to appear fluid, weightless—like a vivid, luminous display without any inherent substance.

Tögal is the moment when the illusion collapses in direct experience. It does not happen through effort or analysis but through a spontaneous shift in seeing. When the habitual mind is silent, when grasping ceases, the world is revealed in its true nature—not as a fixed, external reality but as an unfolding play of light, color. The solid world is no longer solid. The mind is no longer trapped in duality.

Tögal is not just a shift in perspective; it is the direct experience of reality beyond conceptual filters. The material world was never as solid as it seemed. It was attention that maintained the illusion. The moment one stops holding onto appearances as real, the dreamlike nature of material existence becomes self-evident, effortless, and beyond doubt.

A Dzogchen master once said, "Meditation is needed only as long as you believe you are not already awake." This points to the great paradox of practice: if one assumes that meditation is required to reach realization, that assumption itself reinforces the illusion that Conciousness is somewhere else, something to be attained. But the moment one sees that Conciousness is already complete, the need for meditation dissolves.

Dzogchen does not reject meditation because it is ineffective, but because it is often based on the illusion that something must be done to realize the truth. If one meditates with the belief that practice is required to reach Conciousness, then Conciousness remains distant. If one rests effortlessly in Conciousness itself, then nothing more is needed.

This is the paradox: the highest practice is no practice at all. There is nothing to seek, nothing to improve, nothing to hold onto. The more one tries to meditate in order to attain Conciousness, the further away it seems. The moment one drops all effort and simply realizes what is already existant, the search ends.

A student once asked a Dzogchen master, "Should I meditate?" The master replied, "Who is meditating?" If the student looks deeply into this question, they find no self, no separate meditator, no entity that needs to reach anything. There is only Conciousness itself, already vast, already free.

For those who struggle with distraction, meditation may be useful at first—not as a way to reach Conciousness, but as a way to realize how easily attention drifts away. But once recognition is stable, formal meditation becomes unnecessary, even irrelevant. The Concious state is not something experienced only in deep silence or stillness. It is existant everywhere, in all moments, in all activity.

The ultimate realization of Dzogchen is that there is no path, no method, no need for effort. There is only this, as it is. The mind no longer needs to sit and meditate because it has nothing left to search for. The illusion of seeking has dissolved. Conciousness is simply aware, without effort, without grasping, without resistance.

This is the final teaching: if you stop looking for Conciousness, you will find that you were never separate from it.

The Role of the Body and Material Existence

The common misunderstanding in many spiritual traditions is the belief that material existence is an obstacle to Conciousness. Throughout history, countless seekers have renounced the world, retreating into caves, forests, and monasteries in the hope of escaping the distractions of the body and the senses. The assumption is simple: the material world is a hindrance, a veil covering the truth, something to be overcome or abandoned.

Zen and Dzogchen reject this idea completely. Neither sees material existence as a problem. Neither teaches that the body is an obstacle. The world is not something to be escaped; it is the very place where realization happens.

In Zen, Conciousness is not found outside daily life. A master does not ask a student to retreat from the world; instead, he tells him to chop wood, carry water, and eat rice. There is no division between the spiritual and the material, no need to withdraw from the ordinary world in order to awaken. Zen does not teach detachment from the senses—it teaches full engagement with them, but without clinging, without identification. Seeing, hearing, smelling, touching—all of these are already expressions of Conciousness. The only problem is that people become attached to experience, mistaking sensations for something separate from themselves, rather than seeing them as natural movements within Conciousness itself.

A Zen master once said, “This very body is the Buddha.” It is not something to be transcended. It is not something to be rejected. Conciousness is not somewhere beyond physical experience—it is in the very breath, the feeling of the feet touching the ground, the act of washing one’s hands. When the mind stops resisting and fully allows each moment to be what it is, there is nothing left to search for.

Dzogchen, too, does not see the world as an illusion to be escaped. It teaches that all phenomena arise within Rigpa—the natural state of Conciousness. This includes the body, the senses, and the entire material world. Everything is an expression of Conciousness. The mistake is not the existence of the world but identification with it—the belief that one is a separate being, trapped in material existence, moving through a world that is external and independent. In truth, the body, the senses, and all appearances are simply manifestations of Conciousness, momentary reflections in the mirror of Conciousness.

For this reason, Dzogchen does not advocate asceticism. There is no need to reject the world or suppress the senses. One does not need to go into isolation to awaken. The material realm is not a barrier—it is the very field in which realization occurs. The only shift needed is in perception—the recognition that everything, including the physical body and the external world, is appearing within Conciousness itself.

A student once asked his teacher, “How do I free myself from the world?” The teacher laughed and replied, “Show me where you are separate from it.”

Material existence is not a prison. It is only the belief in separation that creates the illusion of bondage. When this belief dissolves, the world does not disappear. The body does not vanish. Instead, everything is seen with absolute clarity—luminous, boundless, and inseparable from Conciousness itself. There is no longer any struggle to escape, because there was never anything to escape from.

The world appears solid, separate, and external because of how attention operates. From birth, the mind is trained to perceive reality in a specific way. It identifies with the body, categorizes sensations, and assumes that what appears through the senses is entirely separate from the Conciousness that perceives it. This habitual perception is what keeps one trapped in material thinking—not because the world itself is a prison, but because attention is so completely absorbed in appearances that it forgets the Conciousness to which those appearances arise.

This conditioning begins early in life. As a child, one learns to name objects, to distinguish between self and other, to navigate the material world through thought and memory. This creates a deeply ingrained habit of externalizing experience, believing that the world is something "out there" and that the thinking mind is merely observing it from inside the body. Over time, attention becomes completely locked onto external objects, sensations, and thoughts about the past and future. What is never taught is how to look inward and realize the Conciousness that is always existant, the formless knowing to which all experiences appear and disappear.

Zen and Dzogchen both point to this misplacement of attention as the root of illusion. The mind habitually grasps at experiences—seeing, hearing, touching, thinking—as if they are real and solid. But when attention shifts from the objects of perception to the Conciousness itself, the illusion collapses. One sees that the external world is not something solid, but a display to consciousness, like images on a screen.

A Zen master once asked his student, “Where do your thoughts come from? And where do they go?” The student, puzzled, could not answer. The master then asked, “If they appear from nowhere and vanish into nowhere, how can they be real?” The point was not that thoughts and perceptions do not exist, but that they have no solidity, no true substance. They arise and dissolve to Conciousness, and yet Conciousness itself remains unchanged.

Dzogchen takes this even further, teaching that the moment attention stops fixating on appearances, Conciousness is naturally realized. You do not need to "reach" Conciousness—you are already Conciousness. The only problem is that attention is so fixated on thoughts, feelings, and physical sensations that it fails to notice the silent, open space to which all of these things arise. The moment attention relaxes, the habitual sense of solidity dissolves.

This is why switching attention to Conciousness dissolves the illusion of a solid, external world. The body does not vanish, but the belief that one is trapped within it dissolves. Conciousness is seen as the ground of all experience, and the idea of being locked in material existence is understood to be a mental habit, not an actual reality.

A Dzogchen master once said, “Your attention is like a flashlight. If you shine it only on objects, the background remains dark. But if you turn it around and shine it on the light itself, the entire illusion disappears.”

The mind is not bound to material thinking—it is simply a matter of where attention is placed. When it is fixated on the external world, the illusion of solidity continues. But the moment attention turns to Conciousness, the illusion collapses. This is not something that requires effort or meditation. It is simply a shift in seeing, a return to the recognition of what has been existant all along.

Rather than being an obstacle, the body itself can be a direct gateway to Conciousness. Both Zen and Dzogchen realize that Conciousness is not about escaping physical existence but fully experiencing it without grasping or resistance. Every sensation, breath, and movement is already an expression of the Concious state. The problem is not the body but identification with the body as something separate from consciousnes. Who wants to become aware ?

In Zen, great emphasis is placed on direct experience over conceptual thinking. The body is not to be rejected but used as a tool for realization. A Zen master does not tell a student to ignore the senses; instead, he instructs them to be fully existant in every moment—in breathing, walking, eating, and even mundane tasks. When attention is completely absorbed in the felt reality of the existant, the mind ceases to divide experience into subject and object. The illusion of separation dissolves.

A monk once asked his master, “Where can I find the Buddha?” The master replied, “Have you ever tasted tea?” The monk nodded. The master said, “Then just taste.” In that moment, the student realized that Conciousness was not something far away—it was in the direct, wordless experience of drinking, eating, and moving.

Dzogchen takes this even further. Unlike traditions that suggest the body and the physical senses are distractions from the spiritual path, Dzogchen realizes that all experiences—whether eating, breathing, or feeling the sun on one’s skin—are already expressions of Conciousness. The material world is not separate from Conciousness but an extension of it, arising to consciousness like waves upon water. There is no need to suppress or transcend sensory experience. Instead, one simply realizes it for what it is: an unfiltered, luminous display of reality.

One of the simplest ways to directly experience this is through breath awareness. Not as a method of control or focus, but as a natural doorway to presence. When one simply notices the breath—without trying to regulate it, without analyzing it—the distinction between "observer" and "breath" begins to fade. There is no longer someone breathing—there is just breath, happening effortlessly within awareness. This simple act can reveal what all meditation seeks to uncover: that the self is not separate from experience, that there is only this moment, perfectly complete in itself.

Movement can also be a direct path to realization. In Zen walking meditation (kinhin), each step is taken with full Conciousness—not as a technique but as an expression of Conciousness itself. With each step, there is no walker, no destination—only movement unfolding to consciousness. In Dzogchen, ordinary actions are seen as sacred not because they are religious, but because they are direct expressions of Conciousness. There is no difference between sitting in stillness and walking across a room—both are appearances to Conciousness, equally valid, equally luminous.

This is why ordinary experiences are sacred in Dzogchen. There is nothing more "spiritual" about meditating in a temple than drinking a glass of water. There is no need to retreat from the world to find Conciousness. The Concious state is already here, in the breath, in the movement of the body, in the simple act of seeing and hearing. The only shift required is recognition—the direct seeing that all of this, without exception, is the dance of Conciousness, free and unobstructed.

A Dzogchen master once said, “If you want to see the nature of reality, do not look beyond what is in front of you. Look at your hands. Listen to the sound of the wind. It is already here.” There is nothing to seek.

Many spiritual traditions teach that transcendence means escaping the world—withdrawing from society, renouncing the body, and severing all ties to material existence. But both Zen and Dzogchen see this as a misunderstanding. There is no need to retreat to a monastery or a cave to realize the truth, nor is there a need to reject the material world in order to awaken. True transcendence is not separation from the world but freedom within it.

The illusion is not the world itself, but the belief that one is bound by it. The mistake is not in having a body, but in identifying with it as something separate from Conciousness. When this identification is seen through, the world does not disappear; rather, it is revealed as something luminous and empty, vivid yet without weight, appearing and dissolving to consciousness like waves in the ocean.

Zen expresses this truth in the phrase: “Before Conciousness, chop wood, carry water. After Conciousness, chop wood, carry water.” This means that nothing needs to change outwardly —only perception shifts. The world remains as it is, but the way it is experienced is completely transformed. There is no longer resistance, no longer the belief that one must escape or fix anything. Life continues, but now it unfolds without struggle, without grasping, without attachment.

Dzogchen takes this even further. It teaches that there is nothing to escape from because the world was never separate from Conciousness to begin with. All appearances arise within Conciousness—they are not obstructions but expressions of it. To reject the world would be like rejecting one's own reflection in a mirror. The moment one stops trying to push the world away, transcendence happens on its own.

A Dzogchen master once said, "The Concious one walks through fire without burning." This does not mean physical fire but the fire of existence—the struggles, attachments, and pains of the world. They do not disappear, but they no longer have the power to bind. There is no need to resist life, just as there is no need to chase after it. One can be fully immersed in the experience of the world yet remain untouched by it, like a lotus growing in the mud but never stained by it.

This is the perfect balance: being fully existant, yet completely free. One does not withdraw from relationships, work, or daily responsibilities, nor does one become trapped in them. Everything is met with complete presence, yet nothing is clung to. One can feel deeply, love fully, experience pleasure and pain—but with a mind as open as the sky, never grasping, never resisting.

The highest transcendence is not an escape from the world but a freedom so vast that one can move through the world without being bound by it. It is neither attachment nor detachment—it is spontaneous, effortless being. The world no longer appears as something separate but as a play of Conciousness, unfolding naturally, free from the burden of struggle.

A Zen monk was once asked, "What is the way of the Concious one?" He smiled and replied, "Walking through the marketplace, with open hands." This is true transcendence—not leaving life behind, but moving through it with nothing to hold onto, nothing to lose, and nothing to chase. The Concious one does not need to escape the world because they were never trapped in it to begin with.

The search for Conciousness often leads people to believe they must step outside of life to find it. They imagine that realization happens in solitude, in meditation, in a state removed from the ordinary rhythms of daily existence. But Zen and Dzogchen reveal the opposite: Conciousness is not separate from life. It is not something outside of the existant moment. It is hidden in plain sight, woven into the very fabric of existence.

There is no need to withdraw from the world or perform special spiritual practices to awaken. The simple act of being fully existant in daily life is enough. It is not necessary to seek mystical experiences or altered states of consciousness. Everything that appears—breathing, walking, eating, hearing the sound of rain—can be a direct gateway to realization, if met without distraction, without grasping, without resistance.

Zen teaches this through the practice of "just this"—just walking, just drinking tea, just breathing. When life is fully lived, with complete Conciousness of what is happening now, Conciousness happens naturally. The mind is not caught in the past or future, not lost in thought, not seeking something better. There is only this moment, complete as it is.

A Zen master was once asked, "How do I find Conciousness?" He answered, "Eat when hungry. Sleep when tired." The student was confused. "But I already do those things." The master replied, "No, you do not. When you eat, your mind is elsewhere. When you sleep, your mind is restless. That is why you do not see."

This is the secret: life itself is the teaching, but people are too distracted to notice it. Conciousness is not something to be found in scriptures, philosophies, or spiritual achievements. It is found in the direct, wordless experience of existence. Every step, every sensation, every breath is an opportunity to realize the truth—if one is simply existing.

Dzogchen expresses the same truth through effortless Conciousness. There is no need to retreat from life because all appearances arise within Conciousness. Reality is already luminous, already perfect, already self-liberated. One does not need to escape or change anything—only to realize that everything is already an expression of the Concious state.

A Dzogchen master once said, "If you want to see the truth, stop looking for it." This does not mean to abandon the search, but to see that seeking itself is the barrier. The more one looks for something "out there," the more one overlooks what is already here. Life itself is the path. There is no need for a special moment of realization—each moment is already it.

This is how Conciousness happens: not through struggle, not through escape, but through the simple act of living with full presence. Eating, walking, breathing, speaking—all of it can be realization if there is no grasping, no distraction, no seeking for something beyond what is already here.

The greatest illusion is believing that Conciousness is somewhere else. The greatest freedom is realizing that there is nowhere to go. There is only this moment, fully lived, fully seen, free from all resistance.

Differences and Similarities Between Zen and Dzogchen

Zen and Dzogchen are often compared because both emphasize direct realization beyond conceptual thought. They reject gradual attainment as a necessary step toward Conciousness, focusing instead on immediate recognition. However, despite these similarities, their methods and styles of teaching are distinct. Many misunderstand their differences, assuming them to be either identical or fundamentally opposed. The truth lies somewhere in between: they are two different expressions of the same reality, pointing to the same sky but using different wings to get there.

Both Zen and Dzogchen arise from Mahayana Buddhism, and both go beyond ordinary Buddhist doctrine by cutting through the illusion of progressive attainment. In most Buddhist traditions, Conciousness is presented as something to be cultivated over time through morality, meditation, and wisdom. But Zen and Dzogchen expose this idea as a barrier to realization—the very belief that Conciousness is distant keeps it hidden. They teach that Conciousness is already here, fully existant, and the only reason it seems absent is because attention is fixated on illusion.

Where they differ is in their approach to this direct realization. Zen, particularly in its Rinzai tradition, often begins with gradual discipline before pointing to sudden realization. A student may spend years practicing Zazen (seated meditation) and working with Koans to exhaust the conceptual mind before experiencing Satori (a moment of sudden realization). This does not mean that Zen ultimately believes in a gradual path—it simply acknowledges that most students are not ready to directly realize their true nature without preparation. Once the student is ripe, realization is immediate, and all prior effort is revealed as unnecessary in hindsight.

Dzogchen, in contrast, offers instantaneous recognition from the very beginning. A true Dzogchen master does not ask the student to train for years before pointing out Rigpa (pure Conciousness). Instead, the student is directly introduced to the natural state and told that no effort is needed—only recognition. The mind does not need purification, discipline, or training, because Conciousness has never been obscured. Any attempt to "practice" Conciousness is already a step away from it.

This difference creates a subtle paradox. Zen appears to begin with gradual practice, but ultimately reveals that no path was ever needed. Dzogchen begins with the direct view, but if the student fails to stabilize recognition, they may need supporting methods (such as Trekchö or Tögal) to deepen their realization. In the end, both approaches lead to the same truth: Conciousness is already existant, and the only task is to stop overlooking it.

Some students resonate more with Zen's emphasis on sitting practice, simplicity, and gradual refinement, while others prefer Dzogchen's radical directness. But ultimately, whether one enters through structured practice or immediate introduction, the final realization is the same: there was never anything to attain, only something to realize.

Zen and Dzogchen are like two paths up the same mountain. One may take a winding route, the other may leap straight to the peak, but when realization dawns, both see the same vast, infinite sky stretching endlessly beyond concepts, effort, and time.

Both Zen and Dzogchen reject reliance on scriptures, doctrines, or conceptual learning as a means to Conciousness. They realize that truth cannot be grasped through words or reasoning—it must be directly realized. This is why both traditions emphasize a non-conceptual transmission between teacher and student, bypassing intellectual understanding and pointing straight to the Concious state. However, the way this transmission occurs differs in each tradition.

In Zen, this is known as "mind-to-mind transmission", a silent, direct realization passed from master to disciple, tracing back to Bodhidharma, the legendary monk who brought Zen (Chan) from India to China. The story of his arrival sets the tone for the Zen approach:

When Bodhidharma reached China, he was summoned to meet Emperor Wu, who had spent years building temples, sponsoring Buddhist monks, and spreading the teachings of the Buddha. Hoping for recognition, the emperor asked Bodhidharma, "What merit have I accumulated?"

Bodhidharma replied, "No merit."

Shocked, the emperor then asked, "What is the highest truth of Buddhism?"

Bodhidharma answered, "Vast emptiness. Nothing holy."

Finally, the emperor asked, "Who stands before me?"

Bodhidharma responded, "I don’t know."

With these words, he shattered the emperor’s illusions. The emperor, still bound by conceptual understanding, did not grasp the meaning, and Bodhidharma left, retreating to a monastery where he meditated for nine years in silence. His transmission was not in scriptures, debates, or logical explanations—it was in direct experience, beyond words.

From this foundation, Zen developed the practice of mind-to-mind transmission, where realization is passed silently from master to student. This transmission is not based on intellectual study but on an energetic recognition, a direct pointing to the student’s own Concious nature. A Zen master does not explain Conciousness; he forces the student into a state where the mind collapses and the truth is directly seen. This may happen through a Koan, a sudden shout, an unexpected action, or even complete silence—whatever is needed to jolt the student out of conceptual thinking and into direct realization.

Dzogchen follows a similar principle but uses a different method. Instead of relying on silent transmission over time, it emphasizes “direct introduction”—a single moment in which the teacher points out Rigpa (pure Conciousness) directly to the student. Unlike Zen, which may use shock or paradox to break habitual thinking, Dzogchen begins with the immediate recognition of Conciousness, without any preparatory training or mental struggle.

A true Dzogchen master does not tell the student to meditate for years before realization. He does not instruct them to perfect their morality or cultivate higher states of consciousness. Instead, he directly introduces the student to the already-existant Conciousness within them, without any effort required. This is known as “the direct introduction to the Natural State.”

A classic Dzogchen instruction might be:

“Right now, you are aware. Do not analyze this Conciousness. Do not search for it. Simply rest in it. That is Conciousness.”

If the student realizes this truth in that moment, nothing else is needed. There is no progressive training, no levels of attainment, no step-by-step path. The teacher’s role is simply to point out what is already fully existant.

While Zen’s mind-to-mind transmission often involves periods of discipline and practice before the moment of Conciousness, Dzogchen assumes that if a student is ready, direct introduction alone is enough. If recognition is not stable, additional practices (such as Trekchö or Tögal) may be given, but these are only reminders, not paths to be followed in a linear way.

Despite these differences in approach, both Zen and Dzogchen agree on one fundamental truth:

Conciousness is already existing. It cannot be gained through words, study, or effort—it can only be directly realized.

Both traditions reject reliance on scriptures or intellectual knowledge as a means to liberation. The only thing that matters is whether the student can directly experience the Concious state for themselves.

A Zen saying captures this truth perfectly:

“Do not mistake the finger pointing at the moon for the moon itself.”

In the same way, Dzogchen warns against becoming attached to concepts:

“The more you search for Conciousness, the further away it seems.”

Whether through Zen’s silent transmission or Dzogchen’s direct introduction, the destination is the same: immediate recognition of the truth, beyond words, beyond effort, beyond time.

The way Zen and Dzogchen approach meditation reveals one of their key differences. Both traditions aim at the direct recognition of the Concious state, yet their methods of pointing to this reality are quite distinct. Zen often begins with structured practice, using meditation as a tool to break through illusion, while Dzogchen bypasses structured methods entirely, pointing directly to effortless Conciousness from the start.

Zen is famous for its discipline and simplicity, with meditation (Zazen) being its central practice. Zazen is more than just sitting—it is an entire way of being, designed to still the mind and allow direct insight to arise. Unlike other Buddhist traditions that focus on visualization, mantra recitation, or concentration, Zen emphasizes "just sitting" (Shikantaza) —a state of pure presence where thoughts are neither followed nor rejected.

Through Zazen, the student gradually comes to see that thoughts, feelings, and even the sense of self are fleeting phenomena, appearing and disappearing to Conciousness. With continued practice, the mind settles into silence, and the illusion of separation dissolves.

Koans serve as an additional tool in Zen, pushing the student beyond intellectual understanding. A Koan is not a riddle to be solved but a mental barrier designed to break habitual thinking. Faced with an impossible question like "What is the sound of one hand clapping?", the logical mind collapses. If the student persists, a sudden shift in Conciousness occurs, leading to a moment of Satori (Conciousness).

At first, Zen seems to require effort—hours of sitting, discipline, and deep inquiry. The paradox is that this effort is only necessary until the realization dawns that nothing needs to be attained. The mind fights to reach Conciousness, only to discover that it was always existant, just hidden by grasping and seeking. The effort dissolves when the student realizes there is nothing to gain, only something to realize.

A Zen master once said, "The harder you try to be Concious, the further away you get. The moment you stop seeking, it is here."

Dzogchen takes a completely different approach. Instead of training the mind through structured meditation, Dzogchen masters introduce the student directly to Rigpa—the natural, awake Conciousness that is already existant. There is no need for progressive practice, no need to still the mind or work through difficult questions. The master simply points to what is already here, and if the student realizes it, nothing more is required.

A Dzogchen instruction might be as simple as:

"Right now, you are aware. That Conciousness has no shape, no boundary, no location. That is Conciousness. Rest in it."

Unlike Zen, where meditation is a method that may eventually drop away, Dzogchen sees structured practice as unnecessary from the very beginning. Conciousness is not something that needs to be cultivated or achieved—it is already fully existant. The only task is to stop overlooking it.

Dzogchen describes ordinary mind (sem) as constantly grasping, dividing reality into subject and object, past and future. But Conciousness is effortless knowing, completely open, never caught in thoughts or identifications. If Conciousness is realized, structured practice is meaningless—there is no need to "develop" something that is already perfect.

A Dzogchen master might say: "Trying to meditate is like a wave trying to control the ocean. Just let go. Conciousness is already free."

If recognition of Conciousness is unstable, the student may be given practices like Trekchö ("cutting through"), which involves releasing all effort and allowing Conciousness to settle naturally. But even this is not a practice in the conventional sense—it is just another way of reminding the student that there is nothing to do, nowhere to go, nothing to fix.

Zen and Dzogchen both point to immediate Conciousness, but Zen often prepares the student before the final breakthrough, while Dzogchen begins with the recognition itself.

Zen understands that most students are deeply identified with their thoughts and false sense of self. If the teacher were to simply say, "You are already Conciousness, just realize it," the student would nod, agree intellectually, and continue living as before. The mind must be forced into surrender, broken out of its habitual conditioning through sitting practice, paradox, and discipline. Only after this groundwork is done can the Zen master say, "Drop all effort—there is nothing more to seek."

Dzogchen takes the opposite approach. It assumes that some students are already ripe and can realize Conciousness immediately. Instead of guiding them through meditation, the teacher gives a direct introduction, trusting that the student will see it instantly. If the student struggles, methods like Trekchö may be given, but even these are about removing effort rather than engaging in structured practice.

A Zen student may spend years in structured training before the realization dawns that there was never anything to attain. A Dzogchen student may realize Conciousness immediately and never need formal meditation at all. Yet, in the end, both arrive at the same place: the effortless clarity of the Concious state.

A Zen saying captures this paradox perfectly:

"Before Conciousness, sit for ten years. After Conciousness, why sit at all?"

And a Dzogchen master might reply:

"If you see the nature of mind, why sit even once?"

Both paths lead to the same truth—whether one begins with effort or with pure Conciousness, the result is the same: Conciousness that is free, boundless, and beyond all practice.

Both Zen and Dzogchen realize that Conciousness is not something gained but something already existant. The only reason Conciousness seems distant is that attention is habitually drawn away from reality as it is and into illusion. The mind, conditioned from birth to identify with thoughts, feelings, and external objects, falls into habitual perception, reinforcing the false belief in a separate self and an independent world. Whether one remains in pure Conciousness or becomes lost in duality is determined by where attention rests.

Conciousness is not something that "comes and goes"—it is the unchanging reality that is always existant. But attention, like a restless flame in the wind, constantly flickers between direct Conciousness and distraction. The moment attention is fully existant, realization is clear. The moment attention is pulled into thought, grasping, or conceptualization, illusion returns.

A Zen master once asked a student, "Where are you right now?" The student answered, "Here." The master struck him and said, "Then why are you lost?" The lesson was simple: the student was existant physically, but attention was elsewhere, caught in thoughts, beliefs, and conditioned patterns. Conciousness is not a distant state—it is simply what remains when attention is fully in reality, not tangled in illusion.

Dzogchen describes this process as falling into dualistic perception. Rigpa—pure Conciousness—is always existant, but the mind constantly grasps at objects, believing them to be separate from Conciousness itself. Instead of recognizing that all experience arises to consciousness, the habitual mind projects a self experiencing a world. In that instant, duality is born, and the illusion of being "inside" or "outside" returns.

A Dzogchen master might say, "You do not lose Conciousness. You simply stop noticing it." This is why Dzogchen does not say that one "falls out of" Conciousness, only that attention moves away from recognizing it.

Zen's solution to habitual perception is often shock and disruption. The master does not explain Conciousness—he forces the student to break free from conceptual thinking immediately. This is why Zen training often includes paradoxical Koans, sudden shouts, unexpected gestures, or long periods of silent sitting. Each of these interrupts the mind's usual patterns and forces attention back into the existant moment.

A student once asked his master, "What is Conciousness?" The master responded, "A dried turd!" The student was shocked—he expected wisdom, not profanity. But in that moment of shock, the mind dropped its expectations, and pure Conciousness appeared. The point was not the words themselves but the sudden shift in attention—from conceptual thinking to direct experience.

Zen also relies on simplicity and discipline to cultivate an environment where habitual perception is weakened. The practice of Zazen (just sitting) trains the mind to remain in pure presence, without chasing thoughts or resisting experience. The daily routines of Zen monastic life—eating, working, walking—are all structured to bring attention fully into the existant moment. Through this discipline, the mind stops seeking, stops wandering, and begins to rest in the direct experience of being.

Dzogchen does not use shock or discipline. Instead, it dissolves distraction effortlessly by pointing out that there is nothing to be distracted from. The very idea that one can "lose" Conciousness is false—what is Conciousness losing itself to? Even thoughts, feelings, and appearances are already expressions of Conciousness, so there is no need to fight or suppress them.

A Dzogchen instruction might say, "If you do not grasp at thoughts, they are already free." Instead of struggling to maintain attention or stop habitual patterns, Dzogchen allows them to self-liberate. There is no need to force Conciousness—just rest in it effortlessly.

While Zen cuts through illusion with direct confrontation, Dzogchen allows all illusions to dissolve on their own. The student is told, "Relax. Do nothing. Just notice." If attention remains naturally in Conciousness, duality does not arise. If it drifts, one simply realizes it again and returns—without effort, without struggle.

A Zen master may say, "Stop chasing thoughts!"
A Dzogchen master may say, "Let them come and go—they were never yours."

In both Zen and Dzogchen, Conciousness is not something distant. It is not a mystical state to be achieved, nor is it dependent on effort or personal purity. It is simply a matter of where attention is placed.

- If attention is caught in thoughts or external appearances, delusion arises.
- If attention rests in pure Conciousness, without grasping or resistance, realization is clear.

A Zen master once said, "The gate to Conciousness is one inch wide—it is the gap between two thoughts." In other words, Conciousness is always existant, but the mind constantly moves away from it by attaching to the next thought, the next perception, the next concept.

A Dzogchen master put it even more simply: "If you do not look for Conciousness, it is already here." The very search for Conciousness pulls attention away from it. The moment one stops seeking, stops grasping, Rigpa is immediately realized as the Conciousness that has never been absent.

Zen and Dzogchen differ in method, but both point to the same truth: Conciousness is not something achieved, only something noticed. The only question is: Where is attention right now? If it is lost in thoughts and appearances, delusion seems real. If it is resting in open Conciousness, the truth is self-evident. The sky has never disappeared—only attention has been fixated on the clouds.

For those who encounter both Zen and Dzogchen, a natural question arises: which path is better? Which method is more effective? Which one leads to Conciousness more quickly or more directly? But the moment this question is asked, it reveals the fundamental illusion—the belief that Conciousness is something external, something to be obtained, and that different paths offer greater or lesser chances of reaching it. Both Zen and Dzogchen dismantle this very notion from the beginning, making the question itself meaningless.

There is no better path, only the one that resonates with an individual's nature. Some are drawn to the discipline and direct challenge of Zen, finding that structured sitting, Koans, and simplicity sharpen their Conciousness. Others feel an immediate connection to the effortless, spontaneous approach of Dzogchen, recognizing that Conciousness needs no cultivation, only recognition. The preference is not about one being superior but about what aligns with a person's disposition. Just as a river and the wind move differently but are both part of the same natural flow, Zen and Dzogchen express the same truth in different ways.

The paradox of choosing a path is that the moment one picks one over the other, the mind has already created a division. If one believes that Zen is superior, they may reject Dzogchen and unknowingly reinforce the illusion of duality, mistaking form for essence. If one believes Dzogchen is the ultimate path, they may overlook the beauty of Zen's direct, silent transmission. But realization is beyond division. Conciousness is not a matter of preference, nor is it dependent on method. Choosing between Zen and Dzogchen is like debating whether the ocean is better than the sky—both are vast, boundless, and without center, only appearing different depending on where one stands.

Ultimately, both Zen and Dzogchen are abandoned when Conciousness is realized fully. Zen practice, with all its discipline, all its Koans, and all its sitting, leads to the sudden recognition that there was never anything to attain. Once this is seen, practice falls away naturally. Dzogchen, with all its direct introductions and effortless resting, ultimately dissolves the very idea of a path, revealing that there was never anywhere to go, never anything to seek, never anyone seeking. What remains is not Zen, not Dzogchen, not Buddhism, not method or tradition, but simply this—open, formless Conciousness, vast and beyond all names. The paths disappear like footprints in the sand, washed away by the realization that there was never a traveler, only the endless sky, already free.

The Paradox of Practice – Why "Trying" Blocks Conciousness

The greatest paradox in Zen and Dzogchen is that seeking Conciousness is what prevents it from being realized. The moment one begins to search for Conciousness, it moves further away. The more effort one puts into attaining it, the more distant it seems. This is not because Conciousness is difficult or hidden, but because the search itself is a distraction, a movement away from the very Conciousness that is already fully existing.

Zen exposes this paradox by constantly confronting the student with their own mistaken assumptions. A famous story illustrates this with a monk who asked his master, "How do I become Concious?" The master responded, "Who is asking?" The monk stood in silence, unable to answer. He had assumed that there was a self that needed to attain something. But the master's response forced him to see the deeper truth—if he looked directly, he would find no fixed self that could become Concious, no separate being to attain anything. The very question was built on an illusion, and by asking it, he reinforced the false idea that there was someone lacking Conciousness. The master's response shattered this illusion in an instant.

Dzogchen takes an even more radical stance. It does not merely point out that seeking Conciousness is misguided; it goes further by saying that the search itself is the problem. The moment one begins looking for Conciousness, it is obscured. Conciousness is not an object that can be found, not a state that can be reached. It is not hidden or distant—it is the very Conciousness that is looking, the one thing that has never been absent. To search for it is to assume that it is elsewhere, which creates an artificial gap between the seeker and the sought. But there is no gap. The moment one stops searching, the illusion collapses, and Conciousness is immediately self-evident.

A Dzogchen master once said, “You cannot find the sky by running in any direction.” The sky is already above, already existant, and running in search of it only takes one further away from realizing that it was never missing. In the same way, searching for Conciousness creates movement where none is needed, reinforcing the illusion that Conciousness is something separate from what is already here.

Zen and Dzogchen both teach that realization does not happen by reaching a goal—it happens by stopping the effort to reach anything at all. The mistake is not in wanting to awaken, but in believing that Conciousness is something outside of “oneself”, something that can be acquired like knowledge or skill. It is not a reward for effort, not a prize at the end of a long path. It is what remains when the mind ceases its grasping, when the search itself is abandoned.

Yet, this paradox existants a challenge. If seeking Conciousness prevents it, does that mean one should do nothing? If effort is the problem, does that mean no practice is necessary? Both Zen and Dzogchen provide an answer to this dilemma, not by rejecting practice, but by showing that it serves a function only until recognition occurs. The path is needed until it is not. Meditation, inquiry, or direct pointing may be necessary for a time, but only as a means to reveal that nothing was ever missing. The moment this is seen, the entire path dissolves, like mist burned away by the morning sun. The question was never how to reach Conciousness, but how to stop running away from what was already here.

If seeking Conciousness prevents it, why do Zen and Dzogchen offer methods at all? If Conciousness is already existant, why practice? The answer lies in the fact that while truth is always available, the mind is not always ready to see it. Conciousness does not need to be created, but the habits that obscure it must be dissolved. The purpose of practice is not to build Conciousness, but to remove the distractions that prevent it from being realized.

Zen emphasizes practice as a way of purifying the mind, but not in the sense of morality or discipline for its own sake. The purpose of Zazen, Koans, and monastic training is to wear down the false self, to exhaust the restless movement of thought until a moment of clear seeing arises. A Zen master does not tell a student to practice so that they can "achieve" Conciousness; rather, practice is like polishing a mirror—the reflection is always there, but the dust covering it needed to be wiped away. Sitting meditation stills the waves of the mind, Koans break habitual thought patterns, and discipline creates an environment where attention becomes sharper and more stable. When the mind has been sufficiently prepared, Conciousness happens suddenly, not as a result of effort, but because all obstacles to it have fallen away.

Dzogchen takes an entirely different view. It does not speak of gradually purifying the mind or training over time because it asserts that Conciousness is already perfect, already fully existant, and cannot be improved. A Zen student may sit for years before realizing that there was never anything to attain, but a Dzogchen master tells the student from the beginning: there is no path because you are already there. Just realize it. However, even though Conciousness is always available, the student may not realize it. This is why Dzogchen still provides direct introduction and sometimes supporting methods—not to create Conciousness, but to help the student stop ignoring what is already there. A teacher may point out Conciousness, but if the student does not yet "see," then the illusion of separation remains. Recognition does not require effort, but it does require an openness that not all students have immediately.

Both paths realize that different people require different approaches. Some need structure, discipline, and practice to bring them to a point of surrender, which is why Zen is useful for those whose minds are restless or heavily conditioned by conceptual thought. The structured environment of practice helps them clear away distractions so that they can finally see. Others may be naturally ripe for realization, ready to realize Conciousness the moment it is pointed out, and for them, Dzogchen's immediate approach is better.

Zen often begins with effort and then dissolves into effortlessness. Dzogchen begins with effortlessness, but for those who fail to realize Conciousness, supporting methods may be needed. In the end, neither path is about "doing" anything—they are simply different ways of allowing the truth to reveal itself. Some need to walk to the cliff before they can jump. Others can leap immediately. The view is the same.

A man seeks to silence the waves of a pond. He kneels beside the water, reaching out with his hands to smooth its surface. But the more he touches it, the more the water ripples. He becomes frustrated, splashing harder, trying to force it into stillness. Yet, no matter how much effort he applies, the water does not calm. Then, exhausted, he stops. He removes his hands, ceases all struggle, and in doing so, the pond naturally settles into perfect stillness on its own.

This is the paradox of realization. The moment one tries to quiet the mind, that very effort creates disturbance. The more one fights thoughts, the more active they become. The more one attempts to push away distraction, the stronger the distractions grow. This is why Conciousness is never something that can be "achieved" through force—it is something that is already existing, just not realized yet. The only thing required is to stop interfering.

Zen realizes this paradox and often expresses it through Koans. A student struggling in Zazen once asked his master, "How do I stop my thoughts?" The master replied, "Tie them down with a rope." The student, confused, asked, "But how can I tie down something that is not solid?" The master responded, "Then why are you trying to hold them at all?" This exchange points to the core mistake—believing that thoughts must be suppressed or controlled in order to realize truth. But thoughts do not need to be stopped. They are like wind passing through an open space—they come, they go, and nothing needs to be done about them.

Dzogchen expresses this in an even more radical way. It does not tell the student to practice sitting, nor does it ask them to cultivate mental stillness. Instead, it points out that the struggle itself is the problem. If one stops grasping at thoughts—stops chasing, suppressing, or engaging with them—then they naturally dissolve. This is not something that must be practiced, but something that is realized. Instead of fighting the illusion, one simply stops giving it attention.

This is why the term meditation is often misleading. In both Zen and Dzogchen, what is traditionally called meditation is not an activity at all, nor is it about focusing or training the mind. A better term is realization—because what is being "practiced" is not the creation of something new, but the direct recognition of what was already existing, just not realized yet.

If one believes they must enter a "meditative state" to reach truth, they have already placed truth outside themselves. If one assumes that realization depends on perfect stillness, they have already fallen into the belief that the natural state is something different from their existant experience. But realization is not something that appears only in silence. It is not something that can be reached through hours of sitting or effort. It is simply the moment when all interference stops.

A Dzogchen master once said, "Trying to calm the mind is like trying to hold the sky in your hands. The more you grasp, the more it slips away. But if you simply look, the sky has always been there." This is the key. Nothing needs to be added, removed, or achieved—only realized. Once one stops trying to shape the water, it reflects the sky perfectly. Once one stops searching for realization, it is found.

One of the greatest misunderstandings about Conciousness is the belief that it is a fixed state that must be maintained. Many assume that once realization occurs, it must be held onto, preserved like a delicate flame that can be easily extinguished. But the very attempt to "stay Concious" becomes a new attachment, a new form of grasping. True realization is not about remaining in a rigid state—it is about allowing it to flow naturally, without resistance, without effort.

In both Zen and Dzogchen, realization is not something separate from life. It is not a condition that must be sustained through continuous vigilance. Instead, it is the natural recognition of reality as it is, without interference. This means that realization does not require a person to withdraw from material existence, nor does it mean permanently abiding in pure consciousness. Attention naturally moves between these dimensions—between engagement with the world and resting in realization. Neither is a problem unless one clings to one and rejects the other.

Zen describes this movement through a simple but profound statement: "Before Conciousness, chop wood, carry water. After Conciousness, chop wood, carry water." There is no need to dwell in an altered state or to reject ordinary life. One can be fully engaged in work, relationships, daily tasks, and yet, at any moment, effortlessly realize the nature of reality. This is not something that requires effort—it is simply an openness to the existant, as it is, without resistance.

Dzogchen expresses this through the understanding that there is no contradiction between pure consciousness and the material realm. The problem arises only when one believes they must remain in one or the other. Some, after glimpsing realization, begin to fear losing it. They cling to stillness, avoid distraction, and try to force Conciousness to remain in a pure state. But this is another illusion—it is like a river trying to hold itself in place. Conciousness naturally flows between stillness and activity, between emptiness and form. Trying to force it to remain in one place is an act of control, not freedom.

A Dzogchen master once said, "If you try to grasp the sky, you will tire yourself for nothing. Let the clouds move, and the sky remains free." This is the essence of realization. It does not require fixation. It does not mean stopping thoughts, stopping action, or stopping engagement with the world. It means recognizing that nothing needs to be controlled, nothing needs to be held onto, nothing needs to be sustained.

Many fear that if they stop trying to "stay Concious," they will lose realization. But realization was never something that could be lost—it was simply existing, just not realized yet. The moment one stops interfering, attention naturally flows between material experience and pure consciousness, with no contradiction, no resistance. There is no need to cling to realization, just as there is no need to cling to the world. One moves between both effortlessly, like the wind passing through an open field—free, formless, and unbound.

All paths, no matter how refined or profound, must eventually be abandoned. Zen and Dzogchen, despite their depth and clarity, are no exception. They serve only as temporary tools, pointing to something beyond all structures, beyond all effort, beyond even the concept of realization itself. At a certain point, the final realization dawns: nothing was ever gained or lost—only realized.

For those deeply engaged in practice, this realization can feel disorienting. They may ask, "What happens after Conciousness? What do I do next?" But the question itself reveals that the mind is still searching for something external, still grasping at a goal that was never separate from them in the first place. The Concious one does not concern themselves with whether they are "Concious" or not. They do not cling to realization, nor do they fear losing it. They simply live, without resistance, without striving, without artificial effort.

Zen expresses this through the image of a man crossing a river on a raft. The raft is necessary to reach the other shore, but once there, it would be absurd to carry the raft on one's back. The purpose of Zen practice is to dismantle illusion—but once illusion has been seen through, the teachings themselves are no longer needed. Even the highest wisdom, once understood, must be discarded. A monk once asked his master, "What is the highest truth?" The master smiled and said, "Throw it away."

Dzogchen makes this even clearer. Since Conciousness was already existing, just not realized yet, there was never anything to attain. Even the idea of realization dissolves. The search was a mirage, the methods were stepping stones that vanish as soon as one steps forward. A Dzogchen master once said, "Before you knew, you sought. Now that you know, what is left to seek?"

When all paths dissolve, what remains? Nothing but life itself—completely natural, completely free. The Concious one does not withdraw from the world, nor do they try to maintain any special state. They do not concern themselves with "practice" or "realization," because these were only concepts needed before recognition occurred. There is no longer any need to think about Conciousness because there is no longer any sense of separation between the one who seeks and what is sought.

A Zen monk was once asked, "What do you do after Conciousness?" He laughed and replied, "I wake up in the morning. I eat when I am hungry. I sleep when I am tired." There is no longer anything to hold onto. No special way to live. No effort to remain in a state of clarity. Reality flows as it always has, only now without resistance, without illusion, without grasping.

The greatest teaching is the one that ultimately destroys itself. The moment one realizes that there was never a path, never a traveler, and never a destination, all teachings fall away. And what is left? Just this.

Integration – Living as an Concious Being

Realization, no matter how profound, is meaningless if it does not transform the way one lives. If Conciousness remains an abstract understanding, something kept separate from ordinary life, then it is incomplete. True realization is not found in the retreat from the world, nor is it a state that one must protect or maintain. It must be fully lived, expressed in every moment, woven seamlessly into the fabric of existence.

Both Zen and Dzogchen emphasize that realization is not about escaping into silence or achieving a detached state beyond human life. Instead, they stress that Conciousness must be embodied—not as an effort, but as something naturally reflected in one's actions, words, and interactions. The world itself becomes the field of realization, not something to withdraw from. If Conciousness is truly realized, then it must be visible in how one moves, speaks, and responds to life.

Zen expresses this truth through its famous saying: "Before Conciousness, chop wood, carry water. After Conciousness, chop wood, carry water." This simple phrase destroys the illusion that Conciousness changes external life in some dramatic way. The trees do not bow, the sky does not glow, and the Concious one does not float above the ground. Life continues as it always has. The only thing that has changed is perception—what was once a world of separation is now seen as a seamless whole. What was once a burden is now an effortless flow. The tasks remain the same, but the struggle is gone.

Dzogchen expresses the same truth by teaching that Conciousness is existant in all activities, not just moments of stillness. There is no need to withdraw from action, nor to escape from the responsibilities of material existence. The Concious being does not abandon the body or disengage from the senses. They eat when hungry, sleep when tired, and move through the world with a natural ease, neither grasping nor rejecting anything. There is no distinction between spiritual life and daily life—everything is part of the same spontaneous unfolding.

Realization does not mean becoming a different kind of person or adopting a special identity. It does not mean wearing robes or speaking in riddles. It means simply being, with no resistance to life, no need to hold onto a concept of Conciousness. It means walking through the world without artificial effort, without striving to "remain" in a state of Conciousness. The greatest freedom is to live naturally, without concern for whether one is Concious or not.

A Zen master was once asked, "How do you live after Conciousness?" He replied, "I let the world take care of itself." This is not an escape from responsibility, but a recognition that there was never anything to control in the first place. Life continues, and the Concious one simply moves with it—silent, open, and free.

The world does not change after Conciousness. The body remains, the senses remain, daily life continues. What changes is how attention functions. Instead of being locked into habitual identification with thoughts and concepts, attention becomes fluid, allowing ordinary activities to become direct experiences of realization. The Concious one does not need to enter a special state to experience truth—truth is found in the simple, natural flow of life.

Attention is like a beam of light. If it is constantly focused on mental narratives, projections, and internal commentary, then reality is filtered through layers of thought. But if attention shifts to immediate experience, everything appears vividly, without the distortion of conceptualization. There is no need to stop thinking or to force the mind into silence. Simply shifting attention out of thought and into direct experience is enough to transform any activity into a field of Conciousness.

Eating, for example, is usually done with little Conciousness. The mind is often elsewhere—thinking about past conversations, planning future tasks, or rushing through the meal without truly tasting it. But when attention is placed fully on the experience of eating, something remarkable happens. The flavors become vivid, textures are fully felt, the act of chewing and swallowing is no longer mechanical but an unfolding event in real time. There is no need to label the experience or think about it—just being fully existant with the sensations is realization itself. There is no "self" eating—there is only eating happening.

Walking, too, becomes entirely different when attention is fully engaged. Normally, walking is treated as a means to an end—getting from one place to another—without noticing the movement itself. But when attention shifts, walking is no longer about "going somewhere" but becomes a pure flow of movement. The feeling of the ground beneath the feet, the rhythm of the steps, the movement of air against the skin—all are experienced without self-reference. There is no "walker" apart from the walking—there is only the sensation of movement, happening on its own, without a center.

Even speaking, which is often entangled in self-consciousness and mental framing, can be an act of direct realization. Usually, speech is driven by inner commentary—thoughts about what to say, how one will be perceived, what effect the words will have. But when attention shifts to simply hearing words arise spontaneously, speech flows without interference. Words appear, sounds form, but there is no "speaker" controlling them—just speech arising from silence and dissolving back into it.

Zen often teaches this through simple reminders such as, "When eating, just eat. When walking, just walk." This is not a command to suppress thought but an instruction to fully engage with the existant action, allowing it to be experienced in its raw, undivided form. Dzogchen expresses the same truth, pointing out that all activities arise within the natural state, and the only mistake is overlooking them by getting lost in mental constructs. When realization is fully integrated, there is no difference between "meditation" and "daily life"—every action, every moment, becomes an expression of truth.

Attention moves between the material realm and consciousness effortlessly. There is no need to remain in stillness, nor to force engagement. Whether eating, walking, speaking, or resting, one simply allows attention to flow naturally, without grasping, without rejecting. In this way, realization is not something separate from daily life—it is daily life, seen as it truly is, free from interference.

One of the greatest transformations that occurs after realization is in the way one perceives relationships and work. Before realization, there is always a sense of self and other, a separation between "me" and the world, between "my experience" and "their experience."

This division is the root of all conflict, all attachment, and all struggle in human interaction. But when self-identification dissolves, relationships no longer function in the same way. They are no longer based on grasping, control, or expectation, but flow naturally, without interference.

Work and relationships often seem like obstacles on the path to Conciousness, distractions that pull one back into illusion. Many imagine that an Concious person must withdraw from society, retreating into solitude to maintain their realization. But this is a misconception. Nothing needs to be avoided, because nothing was ever separate from realization in the first place. A truly Concious being does not need to abandon life—they simply move through it without resistance, without attachment, without conflict.

A Zen monk was once asked, “What changes after Conciousness?” He smiled and replied, “Nothing—but now there is no burden.” Life continues as before, but the struggle is gone. Work is still done, but without the sense of pressure or personal significance. Relationships still unfold, but without clinging or expectation. There is no longer the constant effort to control, to be seen in a certain way, to gain something from others. Instead, interactions become spontaneous and effortless, arising in the moment without pretense.

When one sees without self-identification, relationships lose their tension. There is no longer a person trying to protect an image, no longer a self seeking validation, no longer a fear of rejection or loss. Love, kindness, and compassion arise naturally—not as moral obligations, but as effortless expressions of an undivided reality. Without the illusion of separation, helping another is no different from helping oneself. There is no calculation, no expectation of return, only natural movement, as simple as breathing.

Work, too, becomes free from struggle. Before realization, work is often seen as a means to an end, a task to be completed, a pursuit of success, status, or stability. But after realization, work is simply what it is—something happening, without a separate "doer" behind it. There is no longer resistance to what must be done. The Concious being does nothing special, yet everything is transformed. They may work in a market, in a monastery, in a city or a farm, and yet their work is not a weight, because there is no attachment to outcome, no fear of failure, no clinging to identity.

A Dzogchen master once said, “A fish does not try to swim. A bird does not try to fly. Why do you try to live?” This is the key to integration—letting life unfold naturally, without grasping, without resistance, without separation. One does not need to withdraw from the world, nor does one need to cling to it. Life simply happens, and the Concious one moves through it with empty hands, free and at ease.

The final shift in realization is the complete disappearance of seeking. No longer is there a desire to hold onto Conciousness, to preserve a special state, or to maintain a sense of Conciousness. The struggle to "keep" realization is just another form of attachment, another illusion of self clinging to something. When this grasping is released, life is lived in its most natural and effortless way—without needing to be anything other than what it is.

In the beginning, realization may feel like something extraordinary, something different from the ordinary flow of existence. One may try to protect it, to return to it, to structure life around it. But the deepest realization is not something that needs maintenance. It does not require continuous effort, nor does it need to be reaffirmed. True Conciousness is simply being, without interference. It is not a state to enter, not a condition to preserve, but the complete absence of struggle.

With this, the need for any spiritual identity dissolves. There is no longer a need to be seen as Concious, to carry the idea of Conciousness, or to think about realization at all. It does not matter whether one is realized or unnoticed, whether one teaches or remains silent, whether one follows a path or forgets all teachings entirely. There is no need to wear robes or adopt a particular way of speaking. The Concious one is simply as they are, moving through life as freely as the wind, as unbound as the sky.

Zen expresses this through the phrase, “The Concious one is an ordinary person, but without the burden.” This means that nothing externally changes—one still walks, eats, speaks, and works. The difference is that there is no grasping, no attachment, no inner weight carried. Life is no longer divided into "spiritual" and "mundane"—it is all one seamless, effortless flow.

Dzogchen describes this as the state of naturalness, where nothing needs to be altered or improved. There is no longer an effort to remain in Conciousness, because one sees that one has never left it. There is no need to seek stillness, because all motion is already an expression of the natural state. There is no need to escape into silence, because even sound and movement arise within the same openness. The realization is complete because there is nothing left to hold onto—no teaching, no practice, no goal, no self.

A master was once asked, “What is true freedom?” He laughed and said, “Not needing to ask that question.”

This is the end of the search. Not because something has been found, but because it is clear that nothing was ever missing. One no longer lives as a seeker, nor as a teacher, nor as an Concious being—one simply lives, free from all labels, free from all grasping. There is no longer a destination, no longer a need for special experiences, no longer a need to be anything other than what naturally unfolds. This is the highest freedom—nothing gained, nothing lost, nothing sought. Just this.

Beyond Paths – The Final Realization

In the end, the teacher, the student, and the teaching disappear.

At the highest point of realization, all paths dissolve. Zen and Dzogchen both declare that even their own teachings must be discarded. They are not final truths, not absolute doctrines, but only skillful means—temporary tools used to break illusion. Just as a raft is needed to cross a river but is left behind upon reaching the other shore, all teachings are meant to be abandoned once their purpose is fulfilled.

Zen expresses this through the famous saying, "If you meet the Buddha on the road, kill him." This does not mean to reject the Buddha but to reject the idea that there is something outside oneself to be attained. As long as one holds onto teachings, one remains trapped in duality—mistaking the finger for the moon it points to. When realization is complete, the teaching itself is no longer necessary. The Concious one has no path, no doctrine, no fixed system.

Dzogchen, too, warns against clinging to any method, even its own. It teaches that all concepts, all distinctions, even the idea of Conciousness itself, must eventually dissolve. A Dzogchen master once said, "Buddhism is the final obstacle to Conciousness." This does not mean the teachings are false but that attachment to them becomes a new form of ignorance. If one believes they must "stay in Conciousness" or "follow Dzogchen perfectly," they are still caught in striving. The moment one realizes there was never a path to begin with, all seeking ceases.

The greatest illusion is believing that one must continue holding onto realization or remain within a certain tradition to be Concious. But true Conciousness is beyond Buddhism, beyond Zen, beyond Dzogchen. It is not found in any system, any scripture, any practice. It is the silent, wordless recognition that there was never anything to attain, never anything to lose, never anything to hold onto.

A Zen monk was once asked, "What remains after Conciousness?" He simply closed his eyes and took a deep breath. No explanation was needed. Truth is not in words, not in teachings, not in beliefs. It is in direct, immediate being—unbound, formless, and free.

At the heart of both Zen and Dzogchen lies a simple truth: Conciousness is not a concept, and reality is not something to be understood through words or systems. The moment one becomes fixated on the idea of Conciousness, it becomes another mental construct—just another layer of illusion. True realization is not about having the right beliefs, following a method perfectly, or being able to explain the nature of reality. It is about direct experience, free from interpretation.

In the beginning, one approaches the path through concepts. One reads about Conciousness, contemplates the nature of mind, and tries to understand what realization means. But this intellectual grasping is not the thing itself—it is only a shadow. No amount of study or theory can replace the clarity of direct seeing.

Zen expresses this transformation through a famous saying:

"When I was young, mountains were mountains. Then, after Conciousness, mountains were no longer mountains. Now, mountains are just mountains again."

At first, everything is seen in a simple, ordinary way—mountains are mountains, trees are trees, life is just what it appears to be. Then, when one enters the path, everything seems to shift. The world no longer looks the same. Reality is seen as illusion, everything feels interconnected, and one may fall into the trap of trying to hold onto a "special" understanding. But in the final realization, everything returns to its natural state. The world is exactly as it always was—nothing magical, nothing mysterious, just life itself, experienced fully, without distortion. Mountains are just mountains again.

Dzogchen expresses this through direct introduction to reality itself. Concepts like "Rigpa" and "Conciousness" are only useful until they are realized as unnecessary. A Dzogchen master might say, "Do not look for Conciousness. Just look." This is not a command to seek something, but a reminder that direct perception is always here, already existing, just not realized yet. The moment one stops filtering reality through thoughts, beliefs, or teachings, what remains is simple and self-evident.

As long as attention is locked onto spiritual concepts, one remains disconnected from what is already existant. One who constantly thinks about Conciousness, who tries to "stay in Conciousness," or who debates about Zen and Dzogchen, is still caught in the mind's habitual movement. But one who simply walks, speaks, eats, and breathes—without any need to conceptualize it—is already free.

A Zen master was once asked, "What is Conciousness?" He pointed at a tree and said, "It is just this." Not an idea, not a system, not something mystical—just what is, beyond thought, beyond words. The moment one stops trying to define reality, reality becomes unmistakably clear.

The final and greatest attachment is the idea of Conciousness itself. For as long as one holds onto the concept of being Concious or Un-concious, there remains a subtle sense of separation. The mind creates an image of realization—something special, something set apart from ordinary existence—and clings to it. But true Conciousness is not an identity. It is not a condition to maintain, nor a state to achieve. It is simply living as things are, without interference, without labels, without needing to define anything at all.

Zen warns against this final illusion through its teaching of "ordinary mind". A student once asked his master, "What is Conciousness?" The master answered, "Nothing special." The student, confused, pressed further, "Then what changes after realization?" The master replied, "The wind still blows, the rain still falls." In other words, reality remains exactly as it was—the only thing that disappears is the idea that it should be different.

Dzogchen takes an even more direct approach. It does not speak of a journey toward realization or a transformation into some higher state. It simply points out that what is already existing, just not realized yet, is perfect and complete as it is. The only mistake is thinking that one must hold onto some idea of Conciousness. A Dzogchen master once said, "If you see the moon, do not carry it on your back." Meaning, once realization has dawned, there is no need to keep referencing it, no need to turn it into an identity. Let it go, and simply live.

Many seekers fear that if they stop thinking about Conciousness, if they stop trying to remain "aware" or "awake," they will lose it. But this very fear shows that they are still grasping, still dividing life into "Concious" and "Un-concious." The truth is much simpler: realization is not something that can be held or lost. It is just existence, unfolding moment by moment. Whether one is thinking about it or not makes no difference. The sky does not need to remember itself to be the sky.

A Zen master was once asked, "What is the final stage of realization?" He smiled and replied, "When you no longer care about realization at all." This is true freedom. The mind no longer circles around spiritual concepts, no longer seeks validation for Conciousness, no longer worries about losing what was never separate in the first place. The final realization is that there is nothing to realize. Nothing was ever missing. Nothing was ever apart. There is only this—simple, direct, effortless life.

The final realization is not an attainment but a return—a return to the world, a return to the simplicity of existence, a return to what was always here. The entire path, the seeking, the effort, the questioning—all of it was like walking in a circle, only to arrive back at the place one started. But now, everything is different, not because the world has changed, but because there is no longer the illusion that anything was ever missing.

At the beginning of the search, there is a deep sense that something is wrong, something must be fixed, something must be found. One looks for Conciousness as if it were an object, a state that will remove all suffering, all confusion, all imperfections. But when realization fully matures, it is seen that nothing ever needed to be fixed, nothing was ever truly lost. Life, in its raw, ordinary state, is always complete.

Zen expresses this through the image of the great return—the moment when all seeking ends, and one simply lives, without struggle, without trying to make things different. A Zen master was once asked, "What is the meaning of Conciousness?" He replied, "When hungry, eat. When tired, sleep." The simplicity of this response is its depth—realization is not about becoming someone special, nor about living in an exalted state. It is about moving effortlessly with life, allowing things to be as they are, without interference.

Dzogchen points to the same truth. Since Conciousness is already existing, just not realized yet, there was never a need to search. The return is not a movement toward something new but a dissolving of the illusion that one was ever separate from reality. A Dzogchen master once said, "You leave the ocean to search for water. Then you realize you were always swimming."

With this recognition, there is no longer any resistance to life. One may return to work, to relationships, to daily tasks, but now, nothing binds. The mind is no longer trapped in past and future, no longer tangled in hopes and fears. The world is engaged fully, yet there is no attachment, no struggle, no weight. One walks freely, as the breeze moves through the trees —existant but unbound.

A student once asked his master, "What happens after Conciousness?" The master smiled and said, "You go home." Not to a physical place, but to the simple, natural way of being, where life flows as it always has, but now, without a “self” struggling against it. Nothing was ever missing, nothing needed to change—only the illusion of separation needed to dissolve. And once it has, the great return is complete.

On the Nature of Conciousness and Material Dimension

Consciousness and the material realm are not the same, but they interact through attention. This distinction is clear in experience: when attention is fully absorbed in the material realm, conciousness of consciousness fades. Only when attention is redirected back to consciousness does realization occur. This means that Conciousness is not always automatically existant in experience—it must be realized.

Both Zen and Dzogchen, in their highest teachings, point toward this dynamic of attention moving between material existence and consciousness. However, the way they describe it might sometimes appear to blur the distinction between them, which can lead to misunderstandings.

Zen does not describe consciousness and the material realm as separate substances, but it does acknowledge the way attention shifts between them. Zen constantly warns against getting "trapped" in thoughts, distractions, and material reality. The purpose of Zazen (seated meditation) is precisely to shift attention away from entanglement in the material world and into direct presence, where Conciousness is no longer lost in mental activity or external objects.

The famous Zen teaching "return to the source" implies that attention must move away from material distractions and settle into direct Conciousness. Zen does not say that Conciousness is always existant in one's experience—it acknowledges that the mind becomes distracted, clouded, and absorbed in illusion. However, once realization is stable, Conciousness remains without needing effort to maintain it. But until that stability is reached, Zen sees practice as necessary to return attention to Conciousness.

Zen offers methods to keep bringing attention back to Conciousness, showing that realization is lost when attention moves away from it.

Dzogchen is sometimes misunderstood as saying that one is always in a state of Conciousness, even if they do not realize it. But this is not quite what it teaches. Dzogchen makes a critical distinction between ordinary mind (sem) and pure Conciousness (Rigpa).

Ordinary mind (sem) is fully absorbed in material experience, lost in duality, distraction, and conditioned patterns. In this state, Conciousness is completely ignored—which aligns with experience of people being "trapped" in the material realm. However, Dzogchen teaches that through direct introduction, one can realize Rigpa (pure Conciousness). But—and this is key—if recognition does not occur, the person remains lost in sem.

This means that Conciousness and material existence are distinct, and one’s experience depends on attention. Dzogchen says that without recognition, a person continues cycling through material entanglement, unable to access their deeper Conciousness.

Sometimes Zen and Dzogchen are misinterpreted as saying that the material realm and consciousness are the same thing, or that one is always aware even if lost in illusion. This misunderstanding comes from their non-dual approach, which aims to dissolve the idea of separation between subject and object. But what they actually mean is that even when attention is lost in the material realm, Conciousness is still possible—it has not ceased to exist, but it is not being realized.

A person can be completely unaware of consciousness if their attention is trapped in material existence. This proves that consciousness and the material realm are distinct—one can exist without realizing the other. This is why Zen and Dzogchen emphasize practices that redirect attention back to Conciousness through realization or meditation.

Whether through Zazen in Zen or direct introduction in Dzogchen, both traditions guide one toward shifting attention away from material distraction and back to Conciousness.

If there is a difference, it is mostly in how they describe this movement. Zen often speaks of stilling the mind so that realization can arise, while Dzogchen emphasizes immediate recognition of Conciousness. But in both, the message remains: Conciousness is not automatic—if attention is lost in the material world, realization is absent.

This page is blank. Not because there is nothing left to say, but because truth cannot be captured in words. Every sentence written, every idea expressed, is already one step removed from direct experience. The teachings of Zen and Dzogchen, the explanations, the methods, even the distinctions between consciousness and the material realm—all of these are just pointers, not the thing itself.

A blank page does not explain, does not argue, does not instruct. It simply is. And in that silence, there is a deeper clarity than any teaching can provide.

A Zen master was once asked to summarize the essence of Conciousness. He lifted his brush, dipped it in ink, and drew a single circle. Then, without a word, he put the brush down and walked away.

A Dzogchen master was asked, "What is the final truth?" He closed his eyes, sat in silence, and did not answer.

The great masters understood that words can only point—they cannot reveal. The moment one stops looking for answers in speech, in writing, in ideas, realization becomes possible.

This book, like all teachings, is a raft. You have read the words, followed the path, but the truth was never here. The truth has always been where words do not reach.

Put the book down and REALIZE.
